Cooper said the Tories polled five per cent more votes in Thornhill than the party's national average and increased the Tory vote by 5,000 over the combined Progressive Conservative and Alliance tally in 2000.

"At the end of the day," however, "the message of our national campaign versus their national campaign was lost."

The Liberals, he said, relied on "fear-mongering, which was unfortunate. But people bought it. We ran an honest campaign."

Still, he said, his early review of the results suggests that in polling stations in heavily populated Jewish areas – the riding is 46 per cent Jewish – "we did very well." Part of that can be attributed to the Conservatives' message on "the Israel issue" but "I don't think Israel is a main issue for Jewish voters… There are other issues."

As for his future, Cooper said he had caught the political bug but will regroup and consider his options. "We've got a solid base. Had the national campaign been different…

"There's no doubt the riding is winnable."

In Winnipeg South, meanwhile, Neville increased her margin of victory over her showing in 2000. She received 46.6 per cent of the vote, eclipsing her Conservative opponent, Raj Joshi, by almost 20 per cent.

It was the largest margin of victory in Manitoba, she said.

Neville said Jewish voters in the riding were concerned about Canada's UN voting record, "and I explain that you can't look at the UN resolutions in isolation, you have to look at the other initiatives and the fact that Israel views Canada as one of its best friends."

Neville said local issues, including the planned shut down of an army base, as well as the sponsorship scandal were the main focus of the campaign in Winnipeg South.

She said she hopes Parliamentarians for Israel, where she served as co-chair, will resume its activities, particularly lobbying the foreign minister to moderate Canada's policy towards Israel.

Back in York Centre, meanwhile, Conservative Michael Mostyn was putting a positive spin on his 11,000-vote loss to Liberal Ken Dryden. The riding, he noted, has sent Liberal MPs to Ottawa for more than 40 years. "Basically, they had a Liberal support base of 71 per cent and that was cut down to 55 per cent."

With 21,385 votes, Dryden polled 54.6 per cent of voters. Mostyn received 10,308 votes, or 26.3 per cent of the total. In 2000, however, Liberal Art Eggleton won the riding by 20,000 votes.)

"We made tremendous headway," said Mostyn. "We had to build support from scratch. We had no money and we went up against a Liberal juggernaut with unlimited funds."

Mostyn suggested the short campaign did not allow him to get his name out in the community and match the name recognition of Dryden, an all-star goalie with the Montreal Canadiens and a senior executive with the Toronto Maple Leafs.

Mostyn said that in addition to making inroads in the Jewish community, which is concerned over the Liberal's record on Israel, his views on government waste, scandals and crime resonated with the Jewish and other minority communities in York Centre.

"I think the members of the Jewish community we were able to reach understood our message and we received their support."

Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the absence of a majority government or even an obvious minority configuration will make coming months uncertain.

"I am very heartened that some of the strongest Israel supporters were elected," particularly Cotler and Conservative Stockwell Day, he said.

"In terms of a minority government, we're still in a wait and see mode at the moment. I'm hopeful that the Jewish outcry at the government's voting record at the UN has been heard loud and clear in Ottawa."

While it was unclear which party the Liberals will tap for support, Morgan said "I'm hopeful that on foreign, national defence and security matters, [the Liberals] will rely more on the Conservatives."

"On anti-Semitism and domestic security, the Liberals have been relatively strong… On national security, I hope they stand behind their anti-terrorism legislation."

Morgan said Congress is hopeful the incoming government will agree to the Jewish community's request for funding for security measures that have been implemented at institutional buildings in the wake of a recent surge in anti-Semitic incidents.

B'nai Brith Canada spokesperson Frank Dimant said the Jewish community should be concerned if the Liberals look to the New Democratic Party for support on issues related to Israel.

The court's role is only to determine the sincerity of a claimant's belief, it says.

The Supreme Court says freedom of religion under the Canadian and Quebec rights charters "does not require a person to prove that his or her religious practices are supported by any mandatory doctrine of faith," and any distinction between "obligation" and "custom" is "unduly restrictive."

In this case, the Supreme Court says there is no doubt about the appellants' sincere belief that they must fulfil the obligation of "dwelling" in a sukkah throughout the holiday and that any restriction on that "constitutes a non-trivial interference with and thus infringement of their protected rights…"

The high court did find that, even though the obligation may not be to have a sukkah on one's own property, it sided with the appellants' contention that having to, for example, go to a relative's home or make use of a "communal" sukkah on the condominium property interfered with their enjoyment of the holiday.

The intrusion on the other co-owners' rights to peaceful enjoyment of their property and to personal security guaranteed by the Quebec charter are "at best minimal" and therefore limits cannot reasonably be placed on the appellants' exercise of their religious freedom, the judgment says.

Although part of the common property, the court notes that the balconies are for the exclusive use of the owners of the units.

"The potential annoyance caused by a few sukkahs being set up for the period of nine days each year would undoubtedly be quite trivial," the judgment says.

Nor is asking the appellants to waive their freedom of religion because they signed the declaration of co-ownership justified, according to the Supreme Court.

"They had no choice but to sign the declaration of co-ownership, if they wanted to reside at that complex. It would be insensitive and morally repugnant to intimate that the appellants simply move elsewhere if they take issue with a clause restricting their right to freedom of religion."

The six appellants live in Place Northcrest, two buildings that are part of Le Sanctuaire du Mont-Royal. The dispute goes back to 1996, when two of them, Moise Amselem and his wife, Gladys Bouhadana, were told by the Syndicat Northcrest, the co-owners' association, to remove it, citing the bylaws in the declaration of co-ownership.

The following year, Amselem requested permission from the Syndicat to set up a sukkah on his balcony and was turned down. The Syndicat suggested a "communal" sukkah in the Sanctuaire's gardens as a compromise. The appellants did not accept this proposal, claiming that their personal religious beliefs called for individual sukkot or that it would be a hardship to not observe the holiday in their own homes.

When the appellants went ahead and erected their own sukkot, the Syndicat filed for and won a permanent injunction in June 1998, in Quebec Superior Court, prohibiting the erection of sukkot on balconies.

In 2002, Rochon's decision was upheld by Quebec Court of Appeal in a 2-1 split.

The Supreme Court majority was composed of chief justice Beverley McLachlin and justices Frank Iacobucci, John Major, Louise Arbour and Morris Fish. The dissenters were justices William Binnie, Louis LeBel, Marie Deschamps and Michel Bastarache.

B'nai Brith lawyer Steven Slimovitch said the verdict "sets an important precedent for the exercise of sincerely held religious beliefs. The high court has upheld B'nai Brith's argument that the state should not be the final arbiter of religious dogma. Rather, this must be a private matter set by each individual."

In loving memory of my dad

August 19, 1946 – July 11, 2003

Dad, I can't believe a year has already passed, since you were suddenly taken from us. We miss you so much, your grandchildren, even though so young have not forgotten you, they talk about you all the time. They miss you so much and wish you were physically here with them, as do we all. We love you more than words could say. We will meet again, but for now you are our angel watching over us.

Love always, Natalie and T.E.A.M. Tony, Enrico, Anthony and Matthew Volunteering...For Life!

Betel Centre recognizes over 600 volunteers

Summer is a great time to be a volunteer at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, which recently held its annual banquet acknowledging over 600 volunteers, ranging from 16 to 90.

"Volunteers in their later years are no less energetic than younger ones," says Volunteer Co-ordinator Sharon Chapnick.

Esther Ship volunteers several days a week on the Ticket Sales Desk, serves as Chair of the Centre's Wellness Committee, sits on Members' Council as well as serving as an alternate on the Board of Directors, volunteering at the Centre for twelve years in total. "Volunteering here has helped me enjoy my life."

"I gradually became much more active. I found very, very good friends here, who have helped me through rough times."

Chapnick says members enjoy volunteering on committees where they can be part of the decision-making for the Betel Centre. "They're an integral part of how the Centre works."

Volunteers, both Centre members and non-members, help in every aspect of the Centre, from ticket sales and computers to home visits or meals on wheels deliveries.

Many volunteers join the Centre first, says Chapnick. "They enjoy coming so much, they decide they want to give back to the Centre, both of their time and their expertise."

"I'd never had the opportunity to volunteer before," says Molly Novak, Betel Centre librarian, who has been volunteering for 22 years

Molly is among the Centre's many longtime volunteers. Recently, member Sadie Rose received the Queen's Jubilee Medal for lifelong community service, including her dedicated work at the Betel Centre.

At the volunteer dinner, Sadie read her own poem about volunteering at the Centre. Part of that poem appears below, Sadie's tribute to her wonderful experiences at the Betel Centre.

I awaken in the morning
And my day has just begun
Wouldn't it be great, I think
If I could have a little fun?

My friends are all so busy
That they have no time for me
They're all involved with doing things
To join in or to see

I think I'll join the Centre
To which they all belong
They tell me I can join with them
For as little as a song

The programs are so interesting
They're right for any taste
You may be sure you should attend
'Cause time's not there to waste

So don't sit home and wonder
If there's something you can do,
Just come right in and volunteer,
The Centre welcomes you!

And remember:
Work is for a living
Volunteering is for life!

4-year-old Benny seeking bone marrow transplant

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Once again, the Jewish community is being asked to come forward to help one of its children. Or someone else.

Benny Fulton is a four-year-old Toronto boy who loves Spiderman, Superman, Power Rangers and fighting with his older brother, Max. His favourite activities are going to the cottage, climbing and dressing up as his superheroes.

He also loves cheesecake, pickles, chicken noodle soup and his 10 stuffed dogs, all named Molly.

Benny used to have rosy cheeks and curly blond hair. He doesn't anymore. He has been diagnosed with acute lymphatic leukemia.

Therapy has been ineffective, and now his only hope is to receive a bone marrow transplant. None of his family is a match, and he must depend on the Unrelated Bone Marrow Donor Registry (UBMDR), a service of Canadian Blood Services.

Benny's aunt, Sheila Levy-Bencheton, said that last winter, his parents became concerned when they found bruises all over his body. He was diagnosed in March, and only aggressive chemotherapy has kept him in a stable enough remission to allow him to receive a bone marrow transplant. Provided one can be found in time.

He has developed a gallstone and other stomach problems as a result of his therapy and medication. He has lost his hair.

Benny Fulton in healthier times.

Still, Levy-Bencheton said, "he has shown his own, amazing feats of bravery, and truly puts a smile on the face of anybody who meets him."

Bone marrow, the Canadian Blood Services website explains, is the tissue found in the soft centre of the bones. It manufactures blood cells, including red blood cells, which carry oxygen, white blood cells, which fight infection, and platelets, which help stop bleeding.

In a transplant, a patient's diseased marrow is replaced with healthy marrow from a volunteer donor. Outcome depends on such factors as the level of compatibility between the donor and the recipient, and the stage and type of the disease.

A needle is used to remove bone marrow from the large bones of the donor's pelvis. This procedure is carried out under either general or spinal anesthetic. Most people need only a mild pain reliever after the procedure.

The marrow is replaced in two or three weeks. Complications are extremely rare.

Bone marrow matches are determined according to the compatibility of six genetic markers, called human leukocyte antigens. The best chance for a match is from a person's immediate family. If nobody in the family is a match, as in Benny's case, the next best chance is someone from the same ethnic group.

That is one of the reasons the UBMDR wants to have as diverse a potential donor base as possible.

To join the registry, donors must be between 17 and 50 years of age, meet specified height and weight criteria, and be free of most cancers, heart disease, insulin-dependent diabetes, kidney disease and certain infectious diseases, such as HIV/AIDS and hepatitis.

You may join the registry by filling out the form on the website at www.bloodservices.ca or calling 1-888-2-DONATE. You will be called to give a small blood sample for testing. The information is then added to both the Canadian and international registries.

It must be stressed that you cannot be tested specifically for one particular person. You may be a match for anyone, not only in Canada but all over the world. You may be called soon or over time.

Similarly, the international registry may find someone in England, Israel or Russia, for instance, who is a match for a patient in Toronto.

The Talmud says that he or she who saves one life is as if he had saved the whole world. Joining the registry may mean you can save Benny, or someone else.

Chief Rabbinate: Jewish law bars violence on political issues

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Chief Rabbinate of Israel announced Monday that Jewish religious law (Halachah) prohibits settlers from using violent means to protest the evacuation of any settlements in the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

In its announcement, the Rabbinate stressed that the political dilemmas currently facing the country cannot be resolved by violence. At the same time, however, the Rabbinate fiercely objected to any attempt to accuse Israel's rabbis of incitement to violence.

The announcement came in the wake of statements made by several rabbis recently permitting resistance to the evacuation of settlements.

On Sunday, Shin Bet security services director Avi Dichter also warned the weekly cabinet meeting of growing extremism among some far-right activists and opponents of the government's disengagement initiative.

Cabinet minister Gideon Ezra, responding to Dichter's remarks, said security forces should track down in advance potentially violent opponents of disengagement, and keep them from carrying out "insane acts."

Ezra also warned against forces among the far-right who carried out terror acts against Arab citizens and were not apprehended. He said these people are now likely to act against Jews in their struggle against the disengagement and planned evacuation of settlements.

MK Effi Eitam, leader of the strongly pro-settler National Religious Party (NRP), on Monday called for the arrest of extremists if the Shin Bet has evidence against them. He added that this must be done in order to lift the dark cloud hanging over an entire sector.

Earlier, Rabbi Daniel Shilo, spokesman for the Committee of Yesha Rabbis of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, criticized Dichter's warning.

Rabbi Shilo also said that when the civil rights of settlers are trampled by the government that first sent them to the settlements, one could expect "irregular responses."

But, he added, "it is unacceptable to me that the head of the Shin Bet should speak like this. Either he has solid evidence or he would be better off not speaking, because this [spreading rumours without evidence] is incitement, rebellion, and stirring up fights."

Referring to Dichter, Rabbi Shilo said, "First of all, the spreading of rumours must stop. The propagation of hatred must stop. Solid evidence must be related to, not these sorts of flimsy things. I know no one who says that it is permitted to shove or strike security forces personnel."

He said when opponents of evacuation discuss resistance, "they speak of 'fierce passive resistance.' Expulsion of people from places where they have lived for dozens of years, and who were directed there by the government, this is an act that is the crudest form of trampling of civil rights. So there's no need to be amazed if among the people condemned to this terrible act, there will be irregular responses as well. One can expect this."

Dichter's remarks led Attorney General Menachem Mazuz to call a meeting to discuss the policy of filing indictments on the issue of incitement to violence. The meeting is expected to take place this week.

Mazuz said he called for the meeting because some rabbis have recently called on Israelis to refuse to participate in the future evacuation of settlements.

He also called on rabbis and other public leaders to avoid remarks on political issues that could be misunderstood, and "to refrain from unnecessarily radicalizing conflicts in this sensitive time."

The meeting will be attended by Dichter, Israel Defense Forces' Judge Advocate General Menachem Finkelstein, police representatives and senior officials from the justice ministry and the state prosecution's office.

Ezra recently stirred a storm of controversy by suggesting during a Knesset speech that Gaza Strip settlers should inform on anti-disengagement militants they believe could act with violence.

"With the Israeli government's disengagement plan, we are facing a phenomenon of remarks against the disengagement," Ezra said. "There is liable to be a situation where someone among the settlers, or people outside of the settlements, will interpret incorrectly the comments of rabbis and others concerning resistance. These people must be located ahead of time, and prevented from carrying out any insane acts."

NRP's Eitam said that if Dichter knows of specific individuals likely to commit violence, he should arrest them, rather than effectively casting aspersions over all Israelis opposed to the disengagement.

"I urge the head of the Shin Bet to do his job. If there are things that he knows, it's preferable that he act, rather than to create this cloud hovering over an entire public," Eitam told Israel Radio. "There is an enormous public of religious and secular people who oppose the decision and the process under which the decision was made. This public will struggle for its views in every legal, democratic manner.

"If there are people on some right-wing or left-wing fringe who do not intend to play under these rules, it is the job of the General Security Service [Shin Bet] and the police to arrest them." However, he added, "to sweep a gigantic public and its leaders into a situation of sanctions against free speech is a grave step."

Dichter told the ministers that right-wing extremists recently attacked a lieutenant colonel as he walked through Jerusalem with his wife, because he had helped dismantle the synagogue at the illegal West Bank outpost of Tapuah.

Justice Minister Yosef Lapid said in response that the far-right currently feels as though it can do whatever it wants, after the police failed to arrest the former director of the Prime Minister's Office, Uri Elitzur, who called on settlers to violently resist the evacuation of outposts and settlements.

UN nuclear watchdog visits Israel

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Mohamed El Baradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), was in Israel this week for an official visit of less than 48 hours, but the Dimona nuclear facility was not on his itinerary.

He certainly wanted to see the plant where, according to foreign reports, Israel is developing fissile materials for producing nuclear weapons, but his wish was to remain unfulfilled. The Egyptian diplomat, who has worked for various UN agencies for 30 years, was also not scheduled to visit the research-oriented nuclear reactor in Nahal Soreq. Israel would actually be willing to allow such a visit, but El Baradei was set to make do with the memories of a previous visit to that site in 1997.

El Baradei's schedule did, however, include meetings with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and the director general of the Israel Atomic Energy Commission, Gideon Frank. He was also scheduled to meet with Health Minister Dan Naveh to discuss Israel's research applications vis-a-vis nuclear medicine.

El Baradei was also to be taken on a flight over Israel to see the country's "narrow waist" – the pre-1967 border - between Tulkarm and Netanya.

The architects of Israel's security policies, almost regardless of party affiliation, assert that before Israel discusses its nuclear capabilities, it must have peace agreements with its neighbours, while Arab countries must be stripped of their chemical and biological weapons and Iran must be prevented from obtaining nuclear weapons.

The Arab countries and Iran, on the other hand, demand that there be discussion of Israel's nuclear disarmament before any other steps are taken. The IAEA finds itself in the middle, and under El Baradei, supports the establishment of a Nuclear Free Zone (NFZ).

Israel has already given its agreement in principle to such a zone in the Middle East, but demands that talks take place within the framework of a "non-binding" seminar, based on the model of the Treaty of Tlatelolco, Mexico, where in 1966 the first agreement of its kind was signed, creating an NFZ in Latin America. Since then, accords have been signed in Asia, the South Pacific, and Africa.

However, the Arab countries and the IAEA want the basis for discussion to be the Palindaba Treaty of South Africa, which resulted in an African NFZ. South Africa was also a party to this treaty, and after it agreed to nuclear disarmament in 1989, it allowed the IAEA to visit its facilities and it signed a nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Israel refuses to adopt this model out of concern it will be held to the South African precedent.

El Baradei knows he won't budge Israel from its insistence on the Tlatelolco model. He also knows he will not change Israel's policy of ambiguity – whose logic, El Baradei told Ha'aretz six months ago, he understands completely.

A sense of Israel's attitude to this visit can be ascertained from the Israel Atomic Energy Commission website (www.iaec.gov.il), which states that Israel welcomed El Baradei's visit and pledged to listen closely to him, "within existing and well-known policy parameters."

Nevertheless, El Baradei sees his well-publicized visit and his talks with senior Israeli nuclear officials as an achievement of no small importance.

Canadians mark Jerusalem tragedy that hit close to home

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — When members of the Canadian Jewish community heard that 27-year-old Limor Ben Shoham had been killed in a terror attack at Café Moment in Jerusalem on March 9, 2002, they were even more shaken than usual to hear the news about one of the casualties of terrorism in Israel.

"It didn't feel as though it happened thousands of kilometres away from Canada, like a flash in the news," said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada in Toronto. "This was real. This was about a real family. It was a tragedy that occurred to people we care about – part of our larger family here in Jerusalem."

Finkelstein said many officials from the Canadian Jewish community knew Limor through her father, Shlomo, and her brother, Nir, who operate a taxi service out of Gilo for Canadian visitors to Israel.

"They often drive people from our organization when they are visiting from Canada, so we connected closely with them over the years," he said.

"When Limor died so tragically, we wanted to respond in a concrete way, to support the family and to help them through the difficult time."

That's why UIA Federations Canada, along with FEDERATION CJA Montreal and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, decided to pool their resources with the New Jerusalem Foundation to create a memorial dedicated to Limor, near her parents' house in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo. Of the 591 attacks on Jerusalem since September 2000, 180 have taken place in Gilo.

"The family wanted to put a little bit of her memory here," said Finkelstein. "So, we created this nice little place for them to come and sit, and feel like there is still a little bit of Limor in the neighbourhood."

The $100,000 Cdn, six-pillared Limor Ben Shoham Observation Point, which overlooks the Arab neighbourhood of Beit Saffafa, was unveiled last week at Vardinon and Shabtai Ha'negbi streets. Two hundred friends, family and representatives from the Canadian Jewish community gathered to honour Limor's memory.

"Two years have passed, but the pain is still hard to bear," said Limor's sister, Orit Ben Shoham, at the unveiling. "There are no words to describe the emptiness, the sorrow and the pain that we experience. Every day, every holiday, every event, we feel her loss. Dad would always say, 'Limor is home, the light is home.'

"The house was always open and friends who came to ask for advice found a sympathetic ear when they shared their experiences with her."

Orit said, tearfully, that on the morning of the day she was murdered, Limor went to the beach, where she spent the whole day before going to Café Moment to join her friends.

"Limor found the unique thing about everyone and more than that, she accepted us as we really are, even when it was hard for us to accept ourselves," Orit continued.

"At this monument, we wish to commemorate her. We will always remember

Canadians in Israel attend the unveiling of the Shoham monument in Gilo.

Orit's son, Roi, recited a poem.

"Everything seems like a dream, like the morning will come and you shall smile again with your warmth," he said.

"But reality penetrates and it is very difficult to accept. It is very difficult to understand and move forward. The sound of your laughter was silenced, and the freezing silence penetrates the blood. It is very difficult to forget your smile and your good heart that caused everybody to fall in love with you.

"They say you have to accept the good, the bad and the hurting, even when somebody who you love departs. But it is so difficult when it is about you. We go back home without you now. But we will never forget and always love. You are in our hearts as you were always and you will remain with us in the future."

Limor's best friend since childhood, Dikla Mizrachi, said, "I never imagined that I would have to say things in your memory, to try to describe you to people who never knew you, to describe the loss of you to the world."

Mizrachi recalled that Limor was "a beautiful redheaded girl with a redhead character, always with a big, shiny smile on her face, always willing to help others. She was a star made out of stardust. She had this glowing light that lit up the people who surrounded her. She was full of life and full of joy, and she lived a full life, as if she knew she didn't have all her life to live."

After Limor's father recited Kaddish, Zvi Raviv, director general of the New Jerusalem Foundation, read from a letter sent by Israel's Deputy Prime Minster Ehud Olmert.

"I know that there are no words of comfort that could ease the pain," Raviv said. "But, I congratulate you on the way you find the strength to overcome the great loss and work to eternalize the memory of Limor."

Jerusalem's mayor, Uri Lupolianski, sent his political advisor Jacob Rosen in his place. "I hope that this observation point, which many people will be able to enjoy on behalf of Limor's family, will bring them some comfort and ease some of the pain," Rosen said.

"This dedication ceremony of the Limor Ben Shoham Observation Point represents a deep and special bond between the Jewish communities in the Diaspora and their brothers in Israel. Limor was a Jerusalem resident. But her tragic death in the Moment Café touched the hearts of the Canadian community."

Finkelstein said, "We are here today to honour a beautiful young woman and her memory, and to say to the people of Gilo, 'We are here with you. Your friends in Canada are part of you and stand strong beside you.'"

Orit Ben Shoham thanked the Canadians in attendance. "Your profound connection to Israel is shown through your support of aliyah to Israel and your contributions to hospitals, educational institutions and community centres," she said. "In our difficult situation, Canadians continue to come to Israel and we bless you for that."

Executive vice-president of FEDERATION CJA Montreal, Danyael Cantor, said that the "UIA family is a tight one and the Ben Shohams are part of that family.

"When this tragedy befell them, we had to do something positive, not only to memorialize Limor but [also] to push back the sadness and the loss by doing something positive.

"That's why we are here today. It's a modest token of our feeling and sentiments, but I think it speaks to the Jewish spirit of trying to take the hurt and the pain and turn it into something positive."

Lower taxes in Israel

The Knesset last week approved second and third readings of a bill that will reduce income tax for lower and middle-bracket wage earners and offer them a gradual reduction of other taxes. The tax reductions went into effect July 1.

Sharon heeds High Court

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon ordered the defence establishment to reroute the 30-kilometre stretch of the separation fence between Modi'in and Jerusalem that the High Court of Justice declared illegal, and to examine whether other parts of the fence also should be rerouted in light of the ruling. Sharon said that in areas where there are no legal problems with the route, construction work should begin "immediately, at full speed. As for the rest, in areas where we cannot compromise on security, don't make concessions. But in places where we can, we need to do as little damage as possible to the Palestinians' way of life, and we can move [the fence] a little closer to the Green Line."

Sees through walls

An Israeli company has developed a device that sees through walls. A small, startup company, Camero, based in Herzliyah, has built a radar system that, from 65 feet, can produce three-dimensional images of what's behind a wall, Ha'aretz reported. Such images, using ultra wide-band technology similar to ultrasounds, could be used by troops hunting terrorists.

Study: Israeli children poor

The rate of children's poverty in Israel is higher than in other western nations, a study said. The study done for the Taub Center for Social Policy Studies in Israel by Israel's National Insurance Institute found 600,000 children, 30 per cent of Israeli youth, belong to poor families, the Israeli business newspaper Globes reported. The rate of children's poverty is 26 per cent in Mexico, 22 per cent in the United States, 20 per cent in Turkey, 12 per cent in Greece and Spain, and 3 per cent in Sweden.

Barak contradicts Clinton

Ehud Barak denied a claim in former U.S. president Bill Clinton's autobiography that Syria was ready to make peace with Israel. In My Life, Clinton writes that the former Israeli prime minister could have made peace with Syria in early 2000. At a conference in Netanya, however, Barak said Syria did not agree to new borders but continued to demand the eastern shore of the Kinneret, Israel's main reservoir and an asset Barak had made clear he could not surrender.

Hezbollah extorting money?

Hezbollah is making millions of dollars from the West African diamond business, U.S. diplomats charged. Some of the money comes from extortion, Associated Press reported. Hezbollah allegedly has funnelled money to the Palestinians' Al-Aqsa Brigades for terrorist attacks during the past few years.

World Jewish population growth flat: study

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — For many Jews, the results of a new report on world Jewry represent a case of both good news and bad news.

On the one hand, the number of Jews in the Diaspora is on the decline, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is emboldening anti-Semites worldwide, and Jewish and Israeli morale is down.

On the other hand, Jews worldwide are relatively affluent, educated and politically involved.

The findings are among many in a report on the state of the Jewish people in Israel and abroad, which was presented to the Israeli government Sunday by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute. The institute is a think tank chaired by former U.S. Middle East peace envoy Dennis Ross and funded in part by the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Worldwide Jewish population is approaching zero population growth at 13 million people, the report says. It found that between 1970 and 2003, the world's total population increased by more than 70 per cent, while the total Jewish population increased by only two per cent.

The bulk of Jewish growth has been in Israel.

"The survival of the Jewish people is not assured, though there are great opportunities for a thriving future," the report states. "Therefore, determined and large-scale efforts are needed to maximize the opportunities and ward off the dangers."

Jewish population figures in the Diaspora are declining because of low birth rates, a rise in interfaith marriages and an aging population, according to the 60-page report, which was co-ordinated by well-know demographer Sergio Della Pergola.

The report recommended that Jews take a long-term approach to the future by improving Jewish institutions, leadership and decision-making processes on issues affecting world Jewry.

It also said that improving the security and Jewish uniqueness of Israel should be done in part by encouraging immigration to Israel, spending money from Diaspora Jews on long-term projects aimed at building Jewish identity, and demanding that Israel increase religious pluralism by normalizing the status of non-Orthodox movements in the country.

To counteract the demographic decline in the Diaspora, the study recommends making Jewish education more financially accessible.

Among the report's key findings:

- At the beginning of the 21st century, 92 per cent of the world's Jewish population lived in the top 20 per cent of countries ranked by standard of living.
- Turmoil in the Middle East tarnishes Israel's image in the world.
- The United States' pro-Israel leanings antagonize other countries and generate hostility against Jewish communities.
- Anti-Semitic motifs, including the denial of Israel's right to exist, are gaining currency, particularly in the Muslim world.
- The new anti-Semitism demoralizes Diaspora Jews.
- In the last 20 years, enrolment in Jewish day schools in the Diaspora has grown.

The report is the first to be released by the institute, which said it intends to release the report annually.

Diaspora Jews to help with new constitution

By YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jewish legal experts from the Diaspora will take part in the drafting of a constitution for Israel.

Co-operation between overseas and Israeli jurists in the drafting of the constitution – which is being prepared by the Knesset's constitution, law and justice committee – will have significant impact on clauses that relate to issues of religion and state, citizenship and "Who is a Jew."

The co-operation agreement between overseas Jews and Israelis was worked out last week at a meeting in the offices of attorney Alex Hartman, president of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers. Likud MK Michael Eitan, who chairs the Knesset's constitution, law and justice committee, former justice minister Dan Meridor, and Prof. Arik Carmon, president of the Israel Democracy Institute, were among those at the meeting.

Former Supreme Court president Meir Shamgar, Jewish Agency Chairman Sallai Meridor, and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's bureau chief Dov Weisglass have been involved in other consultations sponsored by the Democracy Institute's "Constitution by Consensus" project.

"You can't ignore the fact that the state of Israel has a crucial connection with world Jewry, and the constitution refers to topics about which the opinion of Diaspora Jews is germane," Hartman said. But he stressed that the overseas Jewish jurists will not play an active role in the drafting of the proposed constitution, but will help clarify certain professional-legal issues and discuss topics of special import to world Jewry.

Participants at last week's meeting agreed to hold a workshop on key issues of interest to world Jewry that relate to the Jewish and democratic character of the State of Israel. The participants emphasized that the overseas jurists' role will be purely advisory, and that the ultimate decision on constitutional matters will be made by Israeli citizens.

Specific items to be discussed in these consultations are citizenship eligibility, anti-Semitism, and religion and state matters.

Hairspray actress appreciates standing ovation

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

At the end of a recent performance of the musical Hairspray, Jewish actor Caissie Levy stands grinning, side-stage, as the wildly appreciative audience rises to its feet.

The 35-member cast, festooned in mile-high wigs and garishly playful 1960s garb, has just nailed the rousing finale of a fast-paced yet seamless show.

"We don't expect a standing ovation every night," Levy says, "but we get one most nights and it sends everyone offstage on such a high. It feels wonderful."

Caissie Levy

Like those onstage, the audience at the Princess of Wales Theatre in Toronto is a veritable rainbow nation of old and young people of varying ethnicities and persuasions. Most are equipped to get every double and triple entendre, delighting in the unending camp, kitsch and spectacle that is Hairspray.

In devotion to the show, more than one young girl in the audience has done her hair up in a sticky bouffant, with a blue (or red or fuchsia) streak painted down the back.

Who knew a cute little story about a chubby teenager, who dreams of singing and dancing on national television in 1960s Baltimore alongside her African American friends, would resonate so strongly in 2004?

"At the core of the show is a longing to be accepted. Everybody can relate to that and everybody loves to root for the underdog," Levy says. "I like to think that people leave the show with a deeper message of integration and race relations, hopefully realizing that people are all the same at heart."

Based on the 1988 John Waters film, staring a hefty-at-the-time Ricky Lake, the Broadway play opened in New York in 2002 to rave reviews and garnered eight Tony awards including best musical. Mounted in Toronto last April with a predominantly Canadian cast, Hairspray is sold out most nights and is generating a lot of positive publicity.

But Levy, 23, who grew up in Hamilton, Ont., is no stranger to adulation. Shortly after graduating from the American Musical and Dramatic Academy (AMDA) in New York City, she toured the United States in the Tony Award-winning musical Rent, and received enthusiastic reviews for her portrayal of one of the principle characters, Maureen, a lesbian performance artist.

"Studying in New York – physically being in the city – was pivotal to my getting the part," she says. "I auditioned once and didn't get it, and then auditioned four months later when they were re-casting the show. I was very lucky."

Acting in Rent meant schlepping around the country on a bus, performing eight times a week and facing some unpleasant situations, such as the odd stage-door protest in the American South in response to the show's gay and AIDS-related subject matter.

"It was very much like a Jewish person experiencing anti-Semitism," she says. "When it happens, it knocks the wind right out of you."

Joining the cast of Hairspray in a supporting role has been a different kind of education for Levy. For one thing, she's dancing for almost two hours each night, something that took a major physical adjustment. Also, instead of playing a lead role (her character, Tammy, has very few lines), Levy's job is to make the company as a whole look good and support the lead character, Tracy Turnblad, played by Vanessa Olivarez, a former American Idol finalist from the show's 2003 season.

"This is the first cast I've been in where everybody gets along," Levy says. "There aren't any riffs in relationships and there are no divas. That has a lot to do with our leadership. Mirvish Productions is a really welcoming place to work and they create an atmosphere of companionship."

Growing up in a kosher, Conservative Jewish home, attending Jewish day schools until Grade 8 and acting in plays at Ontario's Camp Ramah, Levy said she knew very young that she wanted to act, sing and dance. Her parents are both avid theatregoers and art collectors, and they always encouraged Levy and her two older brothers to pursue their desires. Both of Levy's brothers are also in the arts, working in film and television.

"My parents get a lot of joy out of knowing that I am happy and that I pursued what I wanted," she says. "They always told us that they didn't want us to have any regrets in life."

Focused on acting on the Broadway stage in the future, Levy can think of a few dream roles she'd love to take on, including 16-year-old Laura in Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie. But she remains focused in the moment, something she says actors have a hard time doing.

"This is what I always envisioned my job to be," she says. "Not a day goes by that I don't realize how lucky I am – even on the days when I don't feel like smiling for two hours. It's an amazing life to lead."

CHATELAINE EDITOR MAYNARD TURNS THE PAGE

Rona Maynard, editor of the 76-year-old Canadian publishing institution known as Chatelaine, is leaving that hallowed dowager at the end of the year, the magazine announced recently.

There are "a lot of other things that I'd like to experience... I'm a restless person," said Maynard, 54, adding she would likely continue her monthly column for the lucrative women's publication, which is owned by Rogers Media Publishing.

Maynard said she would also like to do some editorial consulting work and take on some speaking engagements. She is contemplating writing a book, she said – which is not surprising, given her family's strong literary background.

Her mother, Fredelle Bruser Maynard, wrote several books, including the two biographical works Raisins and Almonds (1972) and The Tree of Life (1988). And sister Joyce Maynard has also penned numerous titles, none more famous than At Home in the World (1998), her sensational and widely excerpted memoir of her youthful relationship with the reclusive literary legend J. D. Salinger.

If Rona Maynard is only half as successful at writing books as she has proven to be at editing a magazine, her contemplated book is bound to be a best-seller.

Dept. of Theatrical Irony: Although the final curtain fell this week on Ed and David Mirvish's ambitious and entertaining production of The Producers, The New Mel Brooks Musical, it goes out in a burst of glory and recognition in the form of six Dora Awards.

Although the show grossed revenues of about $32 million after 258 performances, thus earning back every penny put into it, its investors were nervous about declining audience numbers in a tourism environment that still hasn't fully recovered from last year's SARS scare.

At the Dora ceremony on June 28, cast members Michael Therriault and Juan Chioran won outstanding performance awards, Rick Fox won for outstanding musical direction, Steve C. Kennedy won for sound design, Susan Stroman won for outstanding direction of a musical, and Ed and David Mirvish won for outstanding production of a musical.

Speaking of the Doras, Tarragon Theatre's production of the Jason Sherman play Remnants won for outstanding production of a play, sharing the honour with The Syringa Tree, a tying production from CanStage. Remnants also took awards for lighting and direction (Richard Rose).

Casting Call: Teatron, the Jewish-friendly theatre company, is holding auditions this summer for the acclaimed plays The Chosen by Aaron Posner and Chaim Potok, and The Sisters Rosensweig by Wendy Wasserstein.

Based on the bestselling Potok novel, The Chosen tells the story of two boys, two fathers and two very different Jewish communities "five blocks and a world apart." Five male actors of varying ages are required. Performance dates are Nov. 26 to Dec. 12.

The Sisters Rosensweig is a thought-provoking comedy that tells the story of three sisters, originally from Brooklyn, who search for love, self-definition and fulfilment. Performances are planned from March 10 to 19, 2005, in co-operation with Amicus Productions. Four female and four male actors of varying ages are required.

Nathan the Wise preaches religious tolerance

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Art is timeless when its message resonates through the ages.

G.E. Lessing's Nathan the Wise, written in 1779, is still relevant as a didactic play preaching religious tolerance in a world of hate and ignorance.

Produced by the Soulpepper Theatre Company and running until July 31 at Harbourfront Centre Theatre, Nathan the Wise is a mesmerizing tale set in Jerusalem during the Crusades.

The first act begins with the moneylender Nathan comforting his daughter Rachel after she is saved from a fire by a mysterious man.

Her knight in little armour turns out to be Conrad, a Knight Templar who belongs to a Christian military order. After befriending Nathan, Conrad falls in love with Rachel, although Nathan is hesitant about offering his daughter's hand in marriage.

The subplot of this drama revolves around the problems of Saladin, the Sultan of Egypt. With dwindling finances, the sultan seeks advice from Nathan the Wise, a name given to him for his Solomon-like wisdom and problem-solving ability.

When Saladin asks Nathan to name the better religious man – Jew, Christian or Muslim – Nathan regales him with a parable that concludes with a non-answer. No religion is holier than the other, he says, but faith is the common denominator that spiritually nourishes a man.

In the first act, director Tim Albery takes us on a journey into intolerance, but later uncovers the warmth within compassionate people.

The second act moves faster than the first, and in it, the play seeks to answer theological questions: Can one can be Christian in blood but Jewish in life? Does the truth cause us to do terrible things to other human beings?

Nathan the Wise explores the themes of anti-Semitism as a weapon, duty versus ethics, fatherhood and religious violence.

The message of Nathan the Wise is to love your neighbour. In tumultuous times, Lessing sees cross-cultural relationships as the key to unlock the door to peace – Jew befriends Christian, Christian shakes hands with Muslim, and Muslim hugs Jew.

William Webster, a Soulpepper veteran, portrays Nathan – a man thought to be modelled after Moses Mendelssohn, a German Jewish philosopher Lessing befriended.

Behind grimaces and thoughtful sighs, Webster digs deep to open his acting arsenal and fully envelops himself in a Jewish thinker trying to right the wrongs in a hateful world.

Dusan Dukic, in the role of Conrad the Knight Templar, stands out. As handsome as he is, Dukic appropriately turns ugly when his thoughts turn to anti-Semitic rage, but he softens when he thinks of the beautiful Rachel.

Cara Pifko plays the lead role in CBC-TV's This Is Wonderland, but in Nathan the Wise she forgoes the spotlight as Rachel. She practically glides across the sand-strewn set, her eyes deep pools of emotion and her smile speaking volumes. The conversations she has with Nathan are especially memorable.

What succeeds best is the play's language. Nathan the Wise is a didactic poem in the purest sense.

For tickets, call 416-973-4000.

The Battle of Algiers: classic cinéma vérité

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although The Battle of Algiers was released in 1965, it is as fresh and relevant today as it was almost 40 years ago.

Rereleased by Rialto Pictures, Gillo Pontecorvo's classic documentary-style film will be screened at the Art Gallery of Ontario by Cinematheque until July 10.

Nominated for three Academy Awards, and the winner of the Grand Prix at the Venice Film Festival, The Battle of Algiers vividly recreates the Arab uprising against France in Algeria.

The Algerians, led by the National Liberation Front, fought for their independence in a brutal, no-holds-barred guerrilla war that erupted in 1954 after 124 years of French colonial rule.

Through a sustained campaign of terrorism in Algeria's white-washed capital city, Muslim rebels waged a successful war.

In 1962, eight years after the French prime minister, Pierre Mendes-France, vowed to crush the rebellion, Algeria gained its sovereignty.

There are chilling parallels between pre-sovereign Algeria and contemporary Iraq, which was occupied by the American and British armies in the wake of the 2003 allied invasion.

In both cases, insurgents resorted to terrorism – random bombings and shootings – to achieve wide-ranging political objectives.

No wonder the Pentagon recently screened The Battle of Algiers for military personnel.

The Algerian model of resistance has also been adopted by the Palestinians in the current intifadah, though the historical circumstances are far from identical and Israel and Algeria can hardly be compared.

The black and white film, which is 123 minutes in length, opens in October 1957, when a grizzled Algerian nationalist breaks down under torture and reveals the hiding place of the last surviving guerrilla leader in Algiers' casbah, Ali La Pointe (Brahim Haggiag).

His interrogator, Col. Mathieu (Jean Martin), modelled after the French general who mercilessly crushed the revolt, is a cool and cerebral soldier who has no illusions about his mission.

Flashing back to 1954, The Battle of Algiers chronicles the fighting in a remarkable succession of taut scenes punctuated by fiery explosions.

Filmed in Algiers, it unfolds against the backdrop of relentless violence as the rebels take their unconventional war into the city's chic European quarter.

After launching a series of attacks that terrorize the civilian population, France calls in the paratroopers, commanded by Mathieu.

He and his men are ruthless as they systematically destroy the rebel network. They win the immediate battle but lose the long-range war for hearts and minds.

Pontecorvo, an Italian Jew, tells the story in a measured fashion, and thanks to his balanced style, The Battle of Algiers remains a shining example of cinéma vérité.

The Battle of Algiers* is still fresh and relevant.

Modigliani largely unappreciated during his brief life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amedeo Modigliani, the great Italian painter and sculptor, was insufficiently valued in his own lifetime.

Critics, art dealers and gallery owners all too often brushed him aside as a minor talent, failing to appreciate the ethereal beauty and historic significance of his work.

Amedeo Modigliani

A Sephardi Jew whose tragically brief life was framed by extreme poverty, substance abuse and chronic ill health, he was one of the most misunderstood artists of the 20th century.

Modigliani was influenced by a hybrid of western and non-western styles, from early Renaissance and Cubist paintings to Japanese prints and Cambodian reliefs.

But at heart, he was a trailblazer whose independent bent of mind yielded an impressive, indelible body of portraiture and sculpture.

Eighty-four years after his untimely death, The Jewish Museum in New York City has mounted the first major exhibition of Modigliani's work in decades, "Modigliani: Beyond the Myth," which explores his development within the context of European modernism.

Indeed, there has not been a show like this since the 1951 retrospective at the Museum of Modern Art in Manhattan.

The current exhibition at The Jewish Museum – which moves to Toronto's Art Gallery of Ontario on Oct. 23 – consists of more than 100 paintings, sculptures and drawings.

They are on loan from collections in Canada, the United States, Israel, Europe, Asia, South America, Japan and Australia.

The catalogue of the exhibition, Modigliani: Beyond the Myth, a hard-back book, was officially published on June 28 by Yale University Press in association with The Jewish Museum.

This handsomely crafted coffee-table volume, edited by Mason Klein, the curator of The Jewish Museum, is made up of erudite essays by Klein and an assortment of Modigliani experts.

But as edifying as their pieces may be, the colour plates of Modigliani's paintings and sculptures leave the most singular, lasting impression.

Modigliani's Portrait of a Young Woman (1916) and Young Seated Girl with Brown Hair (1918) are models of portraiture.

His erotically charged nudes, from Nude (1917) to Reclining Nude with Loose Hair (1917), are also included, as are his stylized sculptures of heads – all obviously marked by African and Egyptian influences – and his unobtrusive drawings of the human form.

Modigliani left only four landscapes, and two, redolent of the Impressionist school, are reproduced – the sombre Small Tuscan Road (1898) and the brighter Landscape at Cagnes (1919).

Born in Livorno (Leghorn) in 1884, he was the fourth child of Flaminio Modigliani and Eugenia Garsin.

The family, which could trace its ancestry to the philosopher Baruch Spinoza, was prosperous until a series of business failures forced them to declare bankruptcy.

If not for the generosity of Eugenia's affluent brother, the Modiglianis might have been far worse off.

Flaminio, being away much of the time, exerted little or no influence on his youngest son. Eugenia, however, imparted imperishable values.

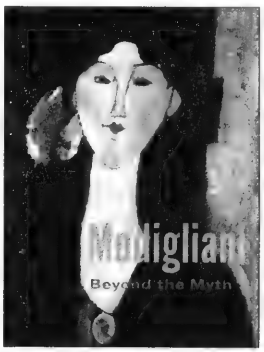
Mother and son, in 1900, visited Rome, where they feasted their eyes on the Borghese Gallery, the Sistine Chapel and various Roman ruins, and Florence, where they saw museums, galleries and churches.

The wealth of these cultural treasures had a tremendous impact on Modigliani's imagination and sensibility.

In 1902, when he was still a teenager, he had the good fortune of meeting the Chilean painter Manuel Ortiz. He regaled Modigliani with stories about Impressionists such as Claude Monet, Camille Pissarro, Paul Gaugin and Vincent van Gogh.

Modigliani studied art in Florence, but soon expressed a desire to move to Paris, where, he was convinced, he could learn more, develop his own esthetic language and fulfil his ambitions.

Arriving in Paris in 1906, Modigliani enrolled at the Academie Colarossi, two of whose graduates were Auguste Rodin and James Whistler.



Paris, the epicentre of the European avant-garde, was fresh and exciting, and Modigliani took full advantage of the city, visiting museums, monuments and churches and making friends and acquaintances. These included Marc Chagall and Chaim Soutine, who would achieve fame.

In Paris, where the Jewish army officer Alfred Dreyfus had recently been falsely convicted of treason, Modigliani was largely perceived as an Italian rather than a Jew. Nevertheless, he faced anti-Semitism there for the first time in his life.

Proud of his Jewish background, Modigliani coped with this age-old animus by regularly introducing himself as a Jew.

"I am Modigliani, Jew," he would say.

One wonders what effect this historically laden declarative sentence had on the people who crossed his path.

Modigliani enjoyed a measure of success, but he was largely ignored by mainstream newspaper critics, and gallery owners and art dealers took little interest in him.

At one point, in desperation, he tried to sell his drawings door to door.

The archetypal bohemian struggling artist, Modigliani drowned out his frustration in the consumption of alcohol and drugs. He was pale and thin, and his health took a turn for the worse.

An island onto himself, he resisted standard artistic practice by more or less eschewing landscapes and still lifes and concentrating on portraitures.

His paintings of nudes, in particular, were alluring.

"Modigliani's nudes reject the traditional western European manner of representing the female figure," Klein observes. "The figures are displayed boldly, with only the faintest suggestion of setting. Languorously outstretched, neither demure nor provocative, they are depicted with a degree of objectivity."

Through all his trials and tribulations, he persisted, and at long last, found a dealer, Paul Guillaume, willing to buy and promote his art.

In a further stroke of fortune, he was introduced to Leopold Zborowski, a fervent art lover from Poland who became one of his closest friends.

Independently wealthy, Zborowski provided Modigliani with a regular weekly salary that enabled him to carry on.

By now, Modigliani's health had deteriorated. On Jan. 24, 1920, he died of tubercular meningitis.

Hearing the news of his death, his pregnant girlfriend, Jeanne Hebuterne, committed suicide, throwing herself out of a fifth-storey window.

Maurice Berger, a senior fellow at the Vera List Center for Art and Politics at the New School University and one of the essayists in Modigliani, believes his legacy is intact.

"Modiglaini is far from an insignificant figure in the history of modern art," he writes in an understatement. " He was an iconoclast who pushed himself to challenge the status quo."

To say the very least.

Ex-artistic gymnast excels at power tumbling

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

At four foot six, Loni Maxwell can jump well above her own height.

As an athlete who is younger than most in her sport, the 10-year-old has skyrocketed in the world of power tumbling.

Since joining Markham Gymnastics in September 2003, Loni has won, individually, five power-tumbling medals, including one gold and four silver, at various Ontario competitions, said her coach, Chris Hanley.

"Loni has had a fantastic year. She's very dedicated and effort-wise has put in quite a bit," he said.

Flipping diagonally across a strip of floor 60 feet long, tumblers are required to complete the number of passes, or skills in a row, that their level demands. In Loni's division, she must complete eight passes – each gaining more tempo than the previous, with her last skill being "the most dynamic," said Hanley.

Loni Maxwell, 10, has won, individually, five power-tumbling medals, including one gold and four silver, since she took up the sport in September 2003.

At her most recent meet – the Eastern Canadian Championships in Montreal, May 1 and 2 – Loni said she scored higher than any of the 21 tumblers she was up against.

"The Eastern competition was my favourite," she said. "I got to go out of town and I won two gold medals [individual and team] and I got a plaque.

"It was actually the competition that freaked me out the most, but getting gold was really exciting. All year, this one girl kept beating me over and over and over. She came in third this time."

Hanley said he was "surprised" at Loni's achievement. "I was just hoping she would place in the top five," he said.

Being an ex-artistic gymnast, Loni has taken to power tumbling naturally, Hanley said. The sport is dominated by athletes who have retired from gymnastics because it is less time consuming and not as physically rigorous.

Loni said she quit artistic gymnastics at nine years old. "I was in this tough program at Sport Seneca, and gymnastics before and after school was just too much for me," she said.

Hanley said Loni came to his club with "a sour taste in her mouth from gymnastics," but she immediately qualified for power tumbling.

"It only took two minutes to assess Loni's skills," he said. "We normally set aside an hour for testing."

He said working with Loni has been both fun and rewarding. "Personality-wise, she's quite a kid, full of spunk. She's not shy in any fashion. She really entertains me."

Loni said her biggest goal as an athlete is for power tumbling to be included in the 2012 Olympic Games, in which she hopes to compete in the future.

"I think Loni will go quite far," said Hanley. "She just has to stay healthy and motivated and have a little bit of luck. But she definitely has the talent."

Now, a Grade 5 student at Willowbrook Public School, Loni said she can balance her studies and sports. Training three times a week in power tumbling may seem like a handful, but for Loni, it's only a sliver of her schedule.

"I train in trampoline, synchronized trampoline and double-mini trampoline at Skyriders," she said. "But that's only two times a week."

Loni's father, Randy Maxwell, said his daughter has won four gold, seven silver and three bronze medals at tumbling and trampoline provincial competitions since November 2003.

While regular trampoline calls for a 10-trick routine, synchronized involves a set of partners on separate trampolines "doing the same moves at the same time," and double-mini "is when you run, jump, do a trick on and a trick off the trampoline," Loni said.

On top of tumbling and trampoline, there are the jazz, hip hop and acrobatics lessons that fill Loni's Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays.

"My friends still can't believe I do it all 50 million times a week, but I don't get tired," she said.

"Sometimes, I slack off in tumbling when it's hot or it smells bad. Other times, I really push myself."

Squeezing dinner into her evenings can be a bit tricky, but when it comes to her diet, Loni said she isn't too picky.

"If I eat something bad, I'll just burn it off at the gym. I only weigh 63 pounds. I don't really have to watch my weight."

When Loni is not in the gym or on the dance floor, she can be found watching The Simpsons and American Idol, listening to "anything but ballet or jazz music" or hanging out with her friends and four siblings.

This summer, Loni travels to Halifax for her fifth summer at Camp Kadimah. In the fall, she will attend Baythorn School for the Arts.

Israeli-Palestinian team treks for peace

By PAULA AMANN
Washington Jewish Week

WASHINGTON — Some analysts believe it will take drastic action to forge an Israeli-Palestinian peace. A few adventurers from both sides of the conflict recently took that advice literally. They headed for Antarctica.

Breaking the Ice, a group of four Israeli Jews, one Israeli Arab and three Palestinians, crossed by boat from Chile to the South Pole region and scaled a previously unclimbed mountain in January. The team dubbed the Antarctic peak, "Mountain of Israeli-Palestinian Friendship."

Team members were recently in the Washington, D.C., area to receive a 2004 Common Ground Diplomacy Through Sport Award from the Search for Common Ground, a non-profit agency devoted to conflict resolution.

Also honoured was the Pontanima Choir from Sarajevo, Bosnia, which includes Orthodox Christians, Muslims and Jews. Drawing on all three religious traditions, the eight-year-old choral group uses music to heal the wounds of war.

One moment of the gruelling Antarcticta trek stood out for Doron Erel, 44, a professional climber and travel writer who helped guide the group.

"We roped together on the glaciers," Erel recalled. "We were navigating pretty dangerous terrain and at a certain point I turned back and saw three Palestinians behind me."

He knew by then that two of the Palestinians had spent years in Israeli prisons during the first intifadah and a third had lost a brother in an Israeli air force strike in 1982.

Yet trust grew between them.

Physical education teacher Olfat Hedar, a Muslim from Haifa, said she found it hard to spend some 40 days in the close quarters of their small sailboat. Yet, as the travellers faced the ice and snow together, they overcame the gulfs of culture and religion.

"In difficult moments, people forgot their political point of view and the differences that divide them back home, and they started to work as a team," said Hedar, 33, who had Erel translate for her. "When there's a big storm at sea or you're climbing a mountain, the only thing that matters is the person."

Her friends and family backed her participation, she said. Erel noted that Hedar, who had injured her back during the voyage, received a lot of attention from Israel's Arab media.

Haifa real estate developer Heskel Nathaniel drew a political lesson from the joint expedition.

"Where we had a clear and defined target in front of our eyes – in our case, getting to the summit of the mountain – all other things lost their importance," said Nathaniel, 41, who initiated the venture. "The moment we got up to the summit and made one step to go back… all the other differences came up."

Nathaniel said the expedition had prompted 39 TV reports, 121 radio interviews and more than 500 press articles worldwide, including in Arab nations.

Back in Israel, however, the project seemed to evoke cynicism more than anything else.

"Nobody really believes it's going to change anything," Erel said. "People are very tired and don't believe in co-existence any more."

But in at least one city, Breaking the Ice appeared to live up to its name. The 300,000-strong Palestinian community of Santiago, Chile, invited the city's smaller Jewish community to co-host a joint welcome ceremony at the airport, Erel said.

This overture yielded three days of events for the trekkers, sponsored by both communities.

"It was the first time the two communities had any connection," Erel said. "That was the moment we realized we had touched people's hearts not just on the boat [to and from Antarctica], but outside the boat."

The Antarctic trip took place under the auspices of the Berlin-based NGO Extreme Peace Missions, which uses outdoor sports to "fuel a sustainable form of conflict resolution," according to www.breaking-the-ice.de.

Such world leaders as UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, European Parliament president Patrick Cox, the Dalai Lama, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and Israeli Labour leader Shimon Peres have signed on as patrons.

Nathaniel, noting that Erel and some of the other Israelis planned the expedition's logistics, including stores of food and water, recalled the ultimate tribute from the Arab participants.

"It's a fantastic compliment from our Palestinian colleagues that they literally placed their destiny in our hands and trusted us without questioning that we would have taken care of them," he said.

Walking to make a difference

Caring people taking proactive approaches in life and working to make a difference are an inspiration. Tamara Truster is one of these people.

From Sept. 10 to 12, Truster, along with three of her closest friends, will be walking 60 kilometres through the neighbourhoods of Toronto during the Weekend to End Breast Cancer. The four young women formed "Team Chai" and are collectively aiming to raise $14,400. Truster, 27, has a personal goal of $3,600.

She explains, "I was staggered to learn that one in nine women will get breast cancer in her lifetime. But for myself and the team, this cause is not simply about compassion. We are four healthy young women who recognize that we could be next. It could be our sisters, our mothers, and our friends. We know it is in all of our best interests to help eradicate the disease before it strikes someone else we care about."

Truster graduated from York University's film and video production program. She recently produced a short film that her sister, Gillian, directed and edited. The film is currently doing the festival circuit. The sisters were raised in a close-knit family in the suburbs of Toronto. Truster says, "My parents have a generosity of spirit that I have grown up with."

This is not the first time Team Chai, which also consists of Alexandra Beck, Janice Grevler and Talia Klement, have walked in support of a charitable cause. A few weeks ago, the team participated in an 8-kilometre walk for Crohn's and colitis. Truster smiles and says, "That was our training walk for the 60K."

The women also have their own personal reasons for walking. Grevler's aunt lost her five-year battle with breast cancer. She explains, "When she was first diagnosed, I was optimistic about her prognosis. Over the years, however, I gained insight into the grave reality of her circumstances and what it truly means to live with breast cancer."

The other women are walking to support family members who are breast cancer survivors.

The Weekend to End Breast Cancer takes place over two days and the participants walk 30 kilometres each day. Food and live music are provided and everyone sleeps in tents. Truster walked last year and was moved by the friendly and supportive community she encountered in the streets of Toronto.

"Neighbours gave out free lemonade, they let us come into their home to use the facilities, and some even put signs on the lawn showing their support."

The money raised will benefit Princess Margaret Hospital, an international leader in the fight against breast cancer, and the largest institution in Canada dedicated to cancer treatment and research. The hospital is launching a new research institute devoted to breast cancer, and it will be led by one of the country's most respected and productive scientists. Last year's walk raised $12.5 million. This year, there are approximately 1,000 more walkers and the amount raised is bound to increase.

The dedicated women of Team Chai are working toward that goal. They are currently seeking corporate sponsors.

"We will be putting the sponsors' names on our T-shirts. [Accounting firm] Truster-Zweig is our first, but we are hoping for many more." She adds, "I feel like I am participating in something that will really help save lives."

If you would like to sponsor Truster, visit www.endcancer.ca and follow the prompts to her personal web page.

Truster and the Team Chai women are committed, courageous and hopeful. We should do everything we can to support them.

HERBED BBQ CHICKEN BURGERS

3/4 cup dried herb-seasoned stuffing cubes
1/2 lb. ground chicken (ground turkey is a fine substitute)
1/4 cup finely chopped onion
1 egg yolk
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground pepper
1/4 cup bottled chili sauce
1/4 cup canned whole berry cranberry sauce vegetable oil
2 large sesame seed hamburger buns

Grind stuffing in processor until fine crumbs form. Transfer 1/2 cup crumbs to large bowl. Mix in chicken, celery, onion, egg yolk, salt & pepper. Form mixture into two 3/4" thick patties. Place remaining crumbs in shallow bowl. Dip patties into crumbs, coating completely. Mix chili sauce and cranberry sauce in small bowl to blend.

Prepare BBQ and brush rack with oil. Grill chicken burgers until golden brown outside, about 7 minutes per side. Spread half of chili-cranberry sauce over bottom half of each bun. Top with burgers and bun tops. Yield: 2 servings.

Philosophical meanderings on Balsam Lake

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

There is a charming cemetery with two dozen tombstones off the road near Beaverton, Ont. One day, I stopped to read the inscriptions, compelled by my fascination at the thought that people actually lived and experienced entire lives on this earth – with love, mismatched socks and beautiful imaginings – before we did.

URBAN WRITER

By reading these abridged bereavement biographies – Arthur P. Macdonald Born 1802 Died 1865 A Father, A Husband and a Good Man – I prove to myself that we who live today are the progeny of billions, and are only the current protectors of our world – modern-day peelers of a layer of truth from a sweet fruit, planted and sown over millennia.

Once I had convinced myself that civilization existed prior to contemporary history, I considered whether our purpose in life can only be actualized in the particular era we are born into.

Rashi, the great Jewish commentator, speaks to this when he discusses the statement that Noah was righteous in his generation. Rashi says that had Noah lived in the time of Abraham, Noah would not have equalled Abraham's level of righteousness and, thus, likely would have played a lesser role in the development of the world. Timing was important in Noah's case.

The question of time relative to purpose also comes into play when one considers the idea that we all stood at Sinai when God gave us the Torah. If one believes this as a statement of absolute truth, then – standing in a crowd of millions – you and I actually rubbed elbows with Ruth, Rabbi Joseph Caro, Amos the prophet, Moshe from Toronto circa 2025 and 600,000 former slaves from Egypt. It would seem that God required every Jew who would ever exist to be physically present at Sinai, so that we might be empowered in harmony to fulfil our everlasting purpose of living and disseminating the teachings of the Torah. In this case, timing played a role in our collective purpose.

If we read the statement – we all stood at Sinai – as a metaphor, would the lesson be different?

Maybe the point is that every single action we are responsible for is born out of a journey of previous actions and is the launching pad for future actions. If we were to create a diagram tracing one specific action – say, respecting our parents – and could follow it backward and forward, we would likely draw a line right back to Sinai, and into the future, forever.

Would we necessarily respect our parents if the Ten Commandments had not prescribed that we do so? Furthermore, by respecting our parents today, are we not, in essence, instructing future generations to do the same?

The statement that all Jews were at Sinai might, therefore, suggest we are all inextricably bound together by our actions, and regardless of whether we acutally stood at the foot of the mountain, our purposes are linked to one another in a time-bound way. In effect, the entire spectrum of time plays a role in our purpose.

These are some philosophical meanderings from a hot summer day on a canoe trip on Balsam Lake, contemplated as I dragged my paddle through the early-morning glassy waters of the summer of 2004. While I pondered these ideas, I saw a woman breast-feeding her baby in Safed in the spring of 600 CE, a man fishing in Mesopotamia in the winter of 500 BCE, and a young girl skiing down the slopes in Collingwood in 2100. They were all considering the very same questions.

Perhaps we were all at Sinai, and maybe everyone who was there is here with us today.

Sudan crisis testing 'Never again'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A reprise of the Rwanda genocide is in the making – this time in western Sudan – and the Jewish community must raise its voice and do what it can to give practical meaning to the phrase "Never again," said a Toronto physician spearheading a Canadian advocacy group.

Dr. Norman Epstein, founder of CASTS (Canadian Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan), said Jews "cannot stand by and be apathetic… Having a deep appreciation of the legacy of slavery and genocide, we should be in the forefront of advocacy for an oppressed group suffering genocide and ethnic cleansing."

Epstein was referring to the conflict in Darfur, an area of western Sudan populated by black Muslims who are being slaughtered by Arab Muslim militias supported by the government in Khartoum.

An estimated 100,000 people have already been killed and one million made refugees.

The conflict in Darfur is the latest for a country that has been in upheaval for two decades as a result of civil war between Muslims in the north and Christians and animists in the south. An estimated two million southerners have been killed in the fighting to date.

With the rainy season at hand, human rights groups believe as many as one million people in Darfur may die of famine and exposure. "This was all created by the attacks of the northern government and their militia henchmen. That's why it's a contrived famine," Epstein said.

CASTS, a grassroots coalition of organizations and individuals dedicated to ending slavery and civil war in Sudan, participated in a vigil last weekend at Queen's Park to draw attention to the issue. Ve'ahavta, a Jewish humanitarian organization, was one of the groups at the event, which was sponsored by several Sudanese associations.

Avrum Rosensweig, founder of Ve'ahavta, said the Jewish community must take an active role in opposing the atrocities in Sudan. "It's so incredibly important that the world open its eyes to the pain and suffering going on there," he said. "The time is now for us to bridge the disconnect between what we preach and 'Never again.' It's not enough to preach."

Jewish groups won't press for hate charges in UTT case

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada say they will not press for hate crime charges to be added to the counts of arson and conspiracy against two young men in connection with the firebombing of the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs library two months ago in April.

Both organizations agree that the hate provisions in the Criminal Code of Canada do not appear to apply in this case. They do, however, expect that if there is a conviction, hate motivation will result in a stiffer sentence, as the law provides.

"It's ironic because this was a deeply hateful act targeting a Jewish school, but we are stuck with a Criminal Code that has less than perfect wording," said David Birnbaum, executive director of CJC, Quebec region.

"We have to agree unhappily that the Code does not seem to afford the Crown the ability to seek hate charges. There has be to be a clear expression of hate against an identifiable group," he said.

Family Sues Liz Taylor

HAMILTON — A Hamilton lawyer is among those suing actress Elizabeth Taylor, saying she has a Nazi-looted painting in her possession. Descendants of Margarete Mauthner – Andrew Orkin of Hamilton, his South African siblings F. Mark Orkin and Sarah-Rose Josepha Adler, and their uncle, A. Heinrich Zille – have filed suit in a U.S. court, saying Van Gogh's View of the Asylum of Saint-Remy was taken from Mauthner in World War II. Taylor's lawyers said Mauthner voluntarily sold the painting to finance her family's flight to South Africa. Taylor's father bought her the painting at a 1963 auction. Andrew Orkin refused to comment to Associated Press.

WORLD

Teen Sues Over Slurs

LOS ANGELES — A Los Angeles-area teen is suing school officials, saying he suffered anti-Semitic harassment. Samuel Goldstein, 16, of Ventura County, filed suit in U.S. District Court alleging a coach at his former high school said "God didn't like him because he was a Jew," while students and teammates made anti-Semitic remarks and Hitler salutes and drew swastikas, without any school response, the Los Angeles Jewish Journal reported. District officials declined to discuss the case.

Belgian Jews Attacked

ANTWERP — Two Jewish men were attacked in separate incidents near Antwerp on July 1. Stones and bottles were hurled at a cyclist in the suburb of Berchem by about 15 youths, the daily Le Soir reported. The man was lightly injured. In another part of the city, a middle-aged man was hospitalized after he was attacked and beaten. The attacks bring to six the number of recent violent assaults on Jewish targets around Antwerp, including the stabbing of a yeshiva student. Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said security would be stepped up around Jewish institutions.

Close Loophole: SWC

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Center denounced a German court ruling allowing the first Nazi protest at a German synagogue since World War II. Two days after the June 24 decision, 200 neo-Nazis demonstrated in front of a rebuilt shul in Bochum that was destroyed in 1938 during Kristallnacht. Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the centre's associate dean, wrote Justice Minister Brigitte Zypries asking her to close legal loopholes allowing the protest. "There must be a way to protect civil liberties of speech and protest without subjecting any house of worship… to the taunts of fanatics, Nazis and racists," he wrote.

U.S. a Puppet: Nader

NEW YORK — The U.S. Congress and White House are "puppets" of Israel, independent presidential candidate Ralph Nader said. "The subservience of our congressional and White House puppets to Israeli military policy has been consistent," he told American Conservative magazine. "Both parties concede their independent judgment to the pro-Israeli lobbies in this country because they perceive them as determining the margin in some state elections and as sources of funding," Nader said. He said he would heed Israel's peace movement in formulating his own policies.

Terror-Diamond Link

KOIDU, Sierra Leone — Hezbollah is making millions of dollars in the West African diamond business, U.S. diplomats charged. Some of the money comes from extortion, and Hezbollah has allegedly funnelled money to the Palestinians' Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade for terror attacks over the past few years. Hezbollah officials declined to comment on the Associated Press report, and one Lebanese trader quoted by AP denied the story.

Bibi Inspired Iraqi Prez

BAGHDAD — Iraq's new president said he was inspired to pursue a career in politics by Israeli politician Benjamin Netanyahu. Ghazi Al-Yawer told the newspaper A-Sharq Al-Awsat that his interest in a political career was sparked when he watched a TV program on the life of Netanyahu, who twice interrupted his studies to serve in the Israeli army at war.

New Zealand to Demand Apology Over Passports

WELLINGTON, N.Z. — New Zealand Prime Minister Helen Clark will demand an apology from Israel and a pledge that Mossad operatives will not try to steal or forge New Zealand passports or use them for their activities, sources told the New Zealand media earlier this month.

The demand follows the arrest in New Zealand in March of two Israelis who have been charged with fraudulently attempting to obtain New Zealand passports. Although they have not been charged with spying, the media have pegged them as Mossad agents, based on police and local sources.

The case winds up on July 15, when a court will sentence Elisha Ben Kara, 50, and Uriel Zoshe Kelman, 31, to a maximum of five years in prison.

On July 2, the pair pleaded guilty to membership in a crime ring trying to obtain a New Zealand passport illegally and fraudulently. Their plea is part of a deal with the prosecution that saw the indictment reduced from three charges to one.

Intelligence sources in New Zealand, including a man who said he had once worked for the Mossad, told reporters that a group associated with the case had been working for years to obtain New Zealand passports, which are considered "door-openers" and do not arouse suspicion in the Arab world.

Two other Israelis are being sought in the case, an unnamed man and one who fled the country before he was caught.

Kara – who says he is an Australian travel agent, although his firm is not on any registries – has entered and left New Zealand 24 times in the past four years.

Israel has so far refused to comment on the case.

Jews and Muslims work together to help Afghan boy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Hamilton launched an appeal last week for funds to help Djamshid Djan Popal, the nine-year-old Afghan boy who arrived in Canada July 2 with his father Shafiullah for treatment of serious heart problems.

Hamilton UJA reaches out

The Hamilton Muslim Association had collected $10,000 as of last week, and the Jewish federation had raised $7,500 to add to their fund.

Djamshid's doctors are donating their services, and last week an anonymous donor came forward to cover the boy's hospital costs, estimated at $1,700 a day. This will allow fundraising efforts to "focus on other support that may be required for Djamshid and his family," according to a news release from the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario in Ottawa (CHEO).

Djamshid was in stable condition last week in the hospital's intensive care unit, awaiting a decision on whether surgery would be possible in his condition. Tests showed severe damage to three of his four heart valves, likely as a result of an infection.

Dr. Lorne Finkelstein, a Hamilton cardiologist who consulted on his care and later helped bring him to Canada, felt a long trip was risky because of Djamshid's grossly enlarged heart and weakened state.

Finkelstein arranged for more sophisticated assessment and treatment at Israel's Hadassah Hospital, but that option was ruled out after a Canadian army doctor, who saw him in May as part of a medical outreach team, expressed concerns for Djamshid's eventual safety.

The army doctor thought there might be repercussions in the boy's Taliban-controlled village, about 5 hours from Kabul, if he was treated in the Jewish state, Finkelstein said.

Finkelstein, the Hamilton federation's representative on an anti-racist committee called Strengthening Hamilton's Community Initiative (SHCI), became involved with the case after reading in the Hamilton Spectator that his SHCI colleague Javid Mirza, president of the Muslim Association of Hamilton, and benefactor Saddique Khan, a Pakistani-born Hamiltonian, were trying to help the boy.

Finkelstein contacted Mirza and offered to help co-ordinate any necessary surgery. He was put in touch with the Canadian Forces doctor in Afghanistan, but information that would have pinpointed the boy's exact problem was "scanty at best," Finkelstein said.

Israel often treats patients from neighbouring Arab countries on a humanitarian basis, including a recent case from Iraq, said Finkelstein, who is planning to lead a federation mission to Israel in the fall.

He made inquiries with friends in Jerusalem who were able to expedite contact with Dr. Yuval Weiss, vice-director of Hadassah Hospital.

Meanwhile, Gerry Fisher, executive director of the Hamilton federation, was in touch with Israel's embassy in Ottawa, which responded "immediately and positively," he said. "They would have intervened on our behalf, arranging for medical treatment or logistics including the flights."

At the same time, while Finkelstein was making inquiries about having Djamshid treated in Canada in case the Israel plans did not work out, he received an e-mail from Mirza, noting how the descendants of Abraham "are going back to working together… together we do make a difference."

Khan, likewise, said he is "encouraged" by the co-operation between the two communities. "Maybe in the future these two communities will become closer," he said. "I'm pretty much positive."

Money raised by the Hamilton Muslim and Jewish communities will go toward post-operative care for Djamshid and helping the boy's family with his needs on his return to Afghanistan, Khan said. "We still need a lot of funds."

International Court of no Justice

From the editor's desk

This column was written before the International Court of Justice released its judgment concerning Israel's security fence. But, as we know, the outcome was a foregone conclusion the very minute the court agreed to hear the case.

As Ha'aretz reported some 24 hours before the scheduled public release of the decision, the court decided by a vote of 14 judges to 1 that the fence is illegal, a violation of international law.

"The construction of such a wall," the judges ruled, "constitutes breaches by Israel of its various obligations under the applicable international humanitarian law and human rights instruments."

The sole dissenter was the American judge, Thomas Buerghenthal.

The reaction to the court's ruling throughout the Arab world and in much of Europe will undoubtedly be ecstatic celebration, bordering on hysteria.

And the recurring images of that celebration will be galling. The smug, finger-pointing editorials and the sanctimonious op-ed opinions will be infuriating. Once again, we will have to calm our nerves and steel our resolve at yet another instance of the topsy-turveying of morality by anti-Israel forces.

Despite the rhetoric and the high-sounding moralizing that has been and will be directed at Israel, the court's decision has no binding effect. One would also hope that the decision would have no future precedential impact on the evolving corpus of international law, for if it does, it will only be to the law's profound detriment.

The ruling does, however, have a potential for harming Israel if it is adopted by the United Nations' Security Council and sanctions are applied against the Jewish state. But that is highly unlikely.

It is inconceivable that such a resolution would not be vetoed.

It would be illogical, indeed hypocritical, for those very countries who objected to the court's jurisdiction to hear the case, to refuse to veto a court-based resolution against Israel in the Security Council.

Many people will try to establish a parallel between the legal process concerning the fence in Israel's Supreme Court last month where the High Court ordered the defence ministry to reroute some 30 kilometres of the fence and the "legal process" in The Hague. But there is no parallel; none must be suggested.

The proceedings in Jerusalem were undertaken in accordance with domestic Israeli law. The proceedings in The Hague were unprecedented: polemics in the guise of legalities, yet another example of the systematic distortion of propriety and protocol by Israel's enemies in their campaign to bring down the Jewish state.

"Military commanders must consider alternatives," the High Court ruled. "Even if they result in a lower level of security, they should bring a substantial – even if not complete – reduction in the harm done to the lives of the local inhabitants."

Israel's defence ministry is complying with the court's decision and is preparing an alternate route for the disqualified section of the fence. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has urged that the High Court's decision be implemented without delay.

The decision in Jerusalem affirms Israel's right to erect the fence as a legitimate method of protecting the country's people. The decision in The Hague denies Israel that right. "The infringements resulting from that route cannot be justified by military exigencies or by the requirements of national security or public order," the judges ruled.

But Israel's bona fide "requirements of national security" were the reason the fence was built in the first place. Israel's need and inherent right to protect its own citizens trumps the International Court's charade.

The fence works. According to Israeli government statistics, it has proven to be effective in preventing harm. In the 11 months since August 2003, when the first section of fence was erected, and the end of June 2004, terrorists managed to infiltrate Israel on three occasions from the Samarian hills of the West Bank, killing 26 people and wounding 76. In contrast, in the 34 months preceding August 2003, terrorists launched 73 terrorist operations inside Israel from the same areas, in which 293 people were killed and 1,950 were wounded.

The highest hypocrisy expressed by a Palestinian official prior to the release of the decision in The Hague, came, not surprisingly, from Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. "I believe the court in The Hague is capable of stopping the construction of the fence that damages our people," he said in Ramallah.

There is no one earth who has brought more damage to his people than Yasser Arafat. And most of his people are beginning to understand this, no matter what the International Court of Justice has ruled.

Suspect acquitted of hate charges

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Ontario court judge has acquitted a 21-year-old man on charges of promoting hatred through the sale of compact discs at a party last year.

Judge D. T. Hogg found there was no evidence Mark Roy Elms sold 15 "horrific" CDs that were seized by police at a private party at the Fox and Fiddle restaurant in Etobicoke in January 2003. "There is no evidence to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused (Elms) sold any of these specific 15 CDs," judge Hogg stated.

Reviewing the evidence in an oral judgement that was later transcribed, Hogg stated that while "there is no question" the CDs belonged to Elms, there was no convincing evidence he sold anything.

"Even if I am wrong, there is no evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, the accused wilfully promoted hatred," Hogg added.

Toronto police laid hate promotion charges after attending a concert in Etobicoke at which several "white supremacist skinhead bands" performed. At the conclusion of the show, the CDs, containing music by "hate rock" groups, were seized, police said at the time.

Hate promotion charges require evidence not only of the promotion of hatred but that the accused intended that hatred be advanced.

The judge acknowledged the evidence showed the Fox and Fiddle had been the venue for "countless skinhead parties," but "there is no evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused is a skinhead. He is not the type, wearing the type of clothes or acting in the type of manner that these people were."

Karen Mock, executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, testified at the trial as an expert witness on the content of the CDs.

Jewish Free Loan Cassa marks 80 years of helping

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

The Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (TJFLC), which provides interest-free loans to needy members of the Jewish community, celebrated its 80th anniversary on July 12.

Following the principle of "helping people to help themselves," the TJFLC supplies loans to local Jews requiring personal, educational or business start-up assistance.

Originally, the cassa existed as three separate organizations. The Toronto Hebrew Re-establishment Services took care of personal loans, Scholarship in Aid handled student loans and the Loan Cassa was in charge of business loans. These services merged into the TJFLC in the 1980s.

Sam Helfenbaum, executive director of the TJFLC, said the concept of a free loan society "has been around for a long time," and reflects the highest level of tzedakah according to Moses Maimonides.

Maimonides held that it is a greater mitzvah to give someone a job or help a person find a job than to give gifts or charity, Helfenbaum said. "In effect, that's what we do."

Providing people with loans rather than charity, "gives people a feeling of self-esteem" and dignity, he said. "The loans are a hand up, not a hand out."

He added that clients "can develop the capacity to pay it back and be a responsible person in our society."

Currently, the TJFLC has 596 outstanding loans, with a total value of more than $1.5 million.

The money for the loans is donated by members of the Jewish community, while UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the United Way fund operating expenses.

Business loans are available to a maximum of $10,000, with a four per cent surcharge.

Helfenbaum said business loans, which help entrepreneurs achieve financial independence, are commonly taken out by women who have recently become estheticians and want to work out of their basements.

"[The loan] gives them some self-sufficiency," he explained.

Personal loans for needy people are provided for medical expenses, funerals, car repair, furniture, debt consolidation, weddings and bar mitzvahs, computer purchases and living expenses. The maximum amount clients can receive for this type of loan is $3,600.

For educational loans, students can receive a maximum of $3,600 to assist them with the cost of post-secondary education and supplements any financial aid or scholarships. Helfenbaum said the TJFLC hopes to increase this amount because of rising education costs.

To qualify for a loan, clients must fill out an application and have at least two worthy guarantors, or three in the case of a business loan.

The interviews, which are conducted by trained volunteers, take approximately 20 minutes. Educational and personal loan meetings take place every other week, while business loan meetings occur once a month.

After the meeting, interviewers discuss the client's application with the TJFLC's volunteer board and committee members. Clients can call the following day to receive their results.

Not everyone who applies for a loan receives one.

"There is an obligation to provide funds for those who need it," Helfenbaum said.

He adds that the cassa has to lend money in an appropriate and respectful way that donors would be comfortable with. This is a dual responsibility, he explained, because the TJFLC must also "retrieve funds for others who need it."

Helfenbaum said he has noticed a change in the people applying for loans.

"Traditionally it's been people from the immigrant population," he said. "But now it's people from the Jewish community who are Canadian-born."

Helfenbaum attributes this difference to the economic situation in Canada, as well as the fact the TJFLC is "getting better known."

The TJFLC has four part-time staff, including Helfenbaum, and about 40 active volunteers who are "very dedicated.

"There is an enormous loyalty from volunteers," he said. "[The work is] very direct and hands-on. One sees results instantaneously."

After 80 years of service, Helfenbaum said, there have been many success stories, and "a couple of instances" where clients have later become volunteers.

"We've even had borrowers who have turned into annual donors."

Obituary

Community volunteer and activist Anne Romoff Gross died July 3 in Toronto. She was 89.

In 1939, Gross became one of the first women to graduate from McGill University in law. At the time, women were not allowed to be called to the Quebec bar, and she never practised.

She threw herself into community work, and held executive positions with Hadassah-WIZO, State of Israel Bonds, the Canadian Zionist Federation, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation.

She was a national committee chair for Canadian Jewish Congress; co-founder and honorary vice-president of the National Women's League, Canada Branch; and national chair of Canada Hall at Hebrew University, and of Youth Aliyah. She was on the national board of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and national chair of the Canada-Israel Foundation of Academic Exchanges.

From 1983 to 1985, she was national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Gross served as sisterhood president of Shaare Zion Congregation in Montreal from 1939 to 1942. She was also legal and civics chair of the Montreal Council of Women.

In 1984, she moved to Toronto, where she lived until her death.

Besides her many formal positions and activities, she lectured widely on Jewish subjects, and on Israel. She also loved and collected Israeli art and antiquities.

Gross was predeceased by her husband Clarence Reuven. She is survived by her daughters Janice Gross Stein and her husband Michael, Susan Gross Solomon and her husband Peter, as well as grandchildren Raphael and Rachel Solomon, and Isaac and Gabriel Stein.

Holocaust conference held in Croatia

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Esther Bem's efforts to help establish a Holocaust education centre in her native Croatia have been rewarded.

The Toronto woman recently participated in the country's first-ever Holocaust conference, titled Human Rights and Education About the Holocaust.

The roots of the conference were planted about three years ago when Bem, now 73, travelled to Croatia after spending several years speaking to Zagreb Jewish community members on the telephone about establishing a Holocaust education program.

With the help of Carole Anne Reed, then the director of education at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, she took with her a suitcase of material covering such topics as running seminars, holding a Holocaust education week, how to teach the Holocaust to students, and how to organize survivor testimonies.

While in Croatia, she set up a committee and spoke to government officials about how the Holocaust is taught in Ontario. Now, one day a year is set aside to commemorate Yom Hashoah.

Until then, she said, the Holocaust was not mentioned in Croatia. "There was an entire generation that did not know the Holocaust existed. If I had not started pushing, they would not know what went on."

The recent three-day conference, complete with kosher meals from Hungary, attracted about 89 teachers and educators from across the country. It was co-funded by Zagreb and the Claims Conference.

Bem, whose sister still lives in Zagreb, made a presentation about Holocaust education in Ontario, gave a speech to 22 high school principals, and met with a member of the local police academy who wanted information on teaching students how to behave with various ethnic groups.

She told conference participants that they were embarking on something historic. "We are meeting with one goal and purpose – to learn from one another how to fight anti-Semitism and racism, and educate the next generation of the enormous dangers the world is facing globally."

In teaching about the Holocaust, "the horror is in the details" said Bem, who is a speaker at Toronto's Holocaust Education Centre. "When a survivor talks about life in a camp, or what is was like to be hidden in an attic, people begin to understand what happened."

Sudan

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan returned recently from Sudan with a promise from the country's president, Omar Hassan Ahmed el-Bashir, to disarm marauding Arab militia who have been terrorizing their black, non-Arab co-religionists in the country's northwest region of Darfur. The militia, known as Janjawid, are widely blamed for killing some 30,000 Sudanese and for driving more than one million people from their homes. The UN has described the situation as the world's worst humanitarian crisis. Annan himself referred to the actions of the Janjawid as "bordering on ethnic cleansing."

No sooner had Annan left the area than Reuters news agency reported that the very militia el-Bashir promised to disarm were being put into police uniforms to patrol the teeming masses of suffering people they had terrorized. The more than one million people forced from their homes have taken shelter in approximately 100 camps in the western Sudanese desert with little access to clean water or proper sanitation. The situation is truly catastrophic.

In fact, the entire country is a catastrophe. Since 1983, more than 2 million people have been killed in Sudan in a genocidal civil war between northern Muslims and southern Christians and animists. Last year, fighting erupted between the nomadic Arab tribes and the sedentary, farming Africans over control of water and arable land in Darfur. African rebel groups took up arms in February 2003 over their government's unjust treatment of them in their struggle with their Arab countrymen.

Peace talks arranged by the African Union are scheduled to begin in Ethiopia on July 15. But it is not clear whether any of the black rebel forces will attend, as they do not trust the process.

In a moving cri de coeur last week, CJN columnist Gil Troy wrote that "the tragedy [in Sudan] is too vast, the needs too great, for us to rest on our debating points and our self-satisfaction. We must do something."

Avrum Rosensweig, founder and director of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, put the challenge quite starkly at a recent gathering in Toronto. "Even though we say 'Never again,' few people are responding to what is happening in Sudan."

Troy and Rosensweig are correct. We must respond.

At the very minimum, we should follow the lead of Canadian Jewish Congress and petition our government to act – to apply pressure on the Sudanese government at every possible opportunity, in every conceivable manner and in every available forum. We should also be giving assistance more directly to relief and aid organizations such as Ve'ahavta that are helping to save the lives of the Sudanese refugees.

If "Never Again!" is to mean anything, it must have meaning also for the people of Sudan. It must apply to all humanity.

Conscience cries out for us to help. History cries out for us to help. And the pitiful, suffering souls of Darfur cry out too for us to help. We must help.

Veterans bespeak courage

It is important to learn about the World War II Jewish servicemen's stories. I want to thank Bill Stern and The CJN for publishing his letter (CJN, Toronto edition, June 24). These servicemen volunteered to lay down their lives to rid the world of Adolf Hitler's draconian domination of Europe. The media, especially in the United States, played down the slaughter of the Jewish population. Fortunately, with the voices of Ben Hecht, Peter Bergson and others, a cry was formulating. Because of these courageous men and women, and the witnesses who lived to tell this tale, like Bill Stern, the shibboleth that Jews "are like sheep" reveal that this myth is "el toro crappo."

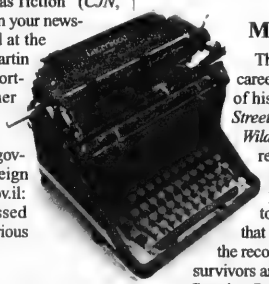
Election aftermath (1)

In his letter "Ad was fact, interview was fiction" (CJN, July 1), Bert Raphael says an ad published in your newspaper referring to Canada's voting record at the United Nations is fact, that the Chrétien-Martin Liberal governments have been non-supportive of Israel, and he hopes that your other readers and I will be influenced by that fact.



I choose rather to be influenced by the government of Israel, whose Ministry of Foreign Affairs states on its website, www.mfa.gov.il: "Canada's support for Israel is expressed through its generally pro-Israel stance in various UN forums."

Election aftermath (2)

Jews in the province of Quebec are faithful to a political party that told Israel to go to hell 113 times at the United Nations!

Where, we must ask, lies the blame for such indifference to our security? The Jews of Canada had better awaken to the fact that, as the saying goes: "You can run, but you can't hide."

For a person such as myself who takes our security seriously, it is amazing that our people and our institutions are reticent to even discuss programs where such matters might be given the attention they deserve.

It is well past time that public debates were held to deal with this problem.

Hoping for the the security of Canadian Jewry, the efforts of this community member will be to remind Canadian Jews of who we are and of our very delicate position in the world.

Court ruling better than nothing

I read and agreed with the letter ("Democracy at work," CJN, July 8) commending the Israeli Supreme Court's decision to move the "security barrier" so that it does not infringe on Palestinian land.

However, I don't believe this is an issue about which we should feel pride and joy. It reminds me of comedian Chris Rock, when he talks about fathers who ask for respect because "they take care of their kids," as if they were performing above and beyond.

The very fact that the barrier was on Palestinian land in the first place is a tragedy, and the fact that it continues to exist, in and of itself, is offensive to many people on both sides of it, literally. But this decision is better than nothing. It is simply a moral imperative not to occupy and expropriate your neighbour's property, not some beautiful generous mitzvah.

Marlon Brando's forgotten role

The various obituaries chronicling the life and career of Marlon Brando have all made mention of his performances in famous films such as A Streetcar Named Desire, On the Waterfront, The Wild One and The Godfather. But we should also recall his role in the 1946 Broadway play A Flag is Born, written by Ben Hecht. The play, set on a Jewish transport ship travelling to Palestine immediately after World War II that is intercepted by British forces, championed the recognition of a Jewish homeland for Holocaust survivors and resistance to British rule.

Starring Paul Muni and Brando, it enjoyed an eight-week run on Broadway. Copies of the script were confiscated by government officials in Canada in response to the play's anti-British sentiment.

Jewish or Israeli?

I am very much concerned that references in The CJN to the people evacuating the Gaza settlements as Jews and not as Israelis feed the animosities toward the people whose religion is Jewish and whose country is Israel. In the article "Gaza withdrawal plan has been launched" (CJN, June 17), the writer refers to "Jewish settlers." In my eyes, they are Israeli settlers.

I fought in the last war in the British navy. I was an Englishman fighting and my religion was Hebrew and on my dog tag was the letter H. Incidentally, the Americans also use that terminology. By continuously referring to Israelis as Jews, we are giving fodder to the anti-Semites.

Jewish history: the art of survival

By BARUCH RAND

There are three traditional patterns in writing Jewish history.

There is the scriptural view that sees history as God's design, plan of action and response to human behaviour. This is the view of the historical books of the Bible and the Prophets of Israel. God has a special relationship with the Jewish people, places on them heavy ethical and legal demands, in particular on their leadership, and rewards them for compliance or punishes them for disobedience.

This view is extended in some observant circles to include all of Jewish history to date. It sees Jewish suffering as a result of constant Jewish failings and the few periods of light as reward for observance of the commandments and prayer. Individual Jews play only a minor role in this view. It is limited to obedience, repentance and prayer, although at times events do not correspond to the piety of a certain generation.

The Israeli Sephardi rabbi, Ovadia Joseph, sees, for example, the Holocaust not necessarily as punishment for an erring generation but as retribution for the sins of previous generations. The course of Jewish and human history are connected in its ultimate goal: an ideal messianic period in which everybody – Jew and gentile – will live in peace and prosperity. This goal is, however, very distant because of our constant failings. Nonetheless, every suffering cleanses us and brings us closer to the messianic period. It means that in some way suffering is positive as it serves the ultimate goal of bringing the Messiah.

Another approach is viewing Jewish history as a constant response to hatred and persecution. The Haggadah gives a lead to this view when it teaches that in every generation there is – and will be by extension – an evil power set to destroy us and only by grace of God the people of Israel are saved from every such predicament. Some rationalistic historians, even of the stature of Heinrich Graetz and Shimon Dubnov, may omit God's saving grace, but they still see Jews constantly responding to anti-Semitism. This kind of history, very common to those days, was labelled by Salo Baron, the great American historian of the last century, as lacrimonuous or tearful. Its tenor is seeing Jews as innocent victims of evil men and ideologies, constantly on the move from one disaster to another and surviving each.

On the other hand, there are some Jewish but mostly gentile apologists who consider Jews an exceptionally gifted people who endowed humanity with enormous treasures, from the Sabbath and the Ten Commandments to Sigmund Freud and Albert Einstein. The most recent of this category of historians is James Cahill, who enumerates in great detail the gifts of the Jews. The more common approach, still within this category, is of such modern Israeli historians as Yitzchak Baer, Chaim Hillel Ben Sasson, Solomon Ettinger and others, who see Judaism basically evolving from the inside and only marginally affected by external influences, except for persecutions. This is the proactive approach fostered particularly in Israel and is a part of the Zionist revolution.

This approach considers the art of survival under hostile circumstances as the greatest gift with which Jews endowed the world. Other religious communities exiled from their homeland and suffering from persecution look at the lesson Jewish history teaches. One of the most prominent scholars of Jewish survival skills is the present Dalai Lama.

The art of survival, as in some of the traditional patterns, does not refer to individual Jews, but to the community as a whole. Millions of individual Jews throughout the centuries perished for being Jewish or opted out from the dangerous framework by conversion or assimilation. Yet the nation as a whole survived. This unusual capability of recovering from a catastrophe was evident throughout the ages since the first major catastrophe that befell Jews in 587 BCE – the exile to Babylonia – till present times.

> 'This unusual capability of recovering from a catastrophe was evident throughout the ages'

After being exiled from Judea, Jews not only established two new centres of Jewish creativity – in Babylonia (later the Persian Empire) and Alexandria in Egypt – but reframed their religion from centralized and temple oriented to decentralized and adaptable to wandering and exile. The ultimate expression of this metamorphosis is in the philosophy of Abraham Heschel, who gave greater significance to time over space.

Sanctuaries in space are geographically limited and destructible, he taught. Building temples in time, around significant days such as the Sabbath and holidays, is indestructible and transferrable. How many of us carry candlesticks and other Sabbath paraphernalia on our trips so that we can usher the special day wherever we are? This is a great art of adaptation, which appears to be an important secret of Jewish survival.

Another example of recovery after a catastrophe is the establishment of the Sephardi Diaspora after the expulsion from Spain. The greatest centre of Jewish learning and creativity collapsed on the Iberian peninsula. Yet those who chose exile over conversion and many of the forcibly converted established new centres of Jewish life.

> Of course, the most miraculous of all the recoveries is the post-Holocaust era

Such centers popped up temporarily in Amsterdam, and Venice and Ferrara in Italy, but primarily in the new magnificent capital of the Ottoman Empire, Istanbul, and in the largest Jewish community of the empire, Saloniki, where Jews were welcomed and protected by their Muslim hosts. There were also mobile financial empires, such as that of the Converso Mendes family, which supported the Jewish cultural and religious revival and contributed to the recovery. Territory was no more a condition for Judaism to survive. Wherever there was even a short window of peace and calmness, Judaism blossomed.

Of course, the most miraculous of all the recoveries is the post-Holocaust era. The Holocaust cost six million Jewish lives. Millions more were lost to Judaism by conversion or assimilation. Most Jewish historians of the modern era dwell at length on the horrors of the catastrophe – which was unparalleled in history – and less on the skill of survival.

But, lo, in the wake of the darkest night in Jewish history emerged the brightest day. Not one, but two, spiritual centres of Judaism surfaced within a few years from the disaster, in North America and Israel.

The resurgence of Israel, the ability of the Jewish people to re-establish a state in their ancestral homeland, to revive the ancient language of the Torah and convert it into a modern idiom, the ability to recentralize millions of Jews from all the corners of the earth and remould them into one nation, in spite of cultural differences among them, is the epitome of the skill of survival. It never happened in history before.

True, the establishment of the political centre in Israel is not yet completed. To attain the zenith of creativity, peace and prosperity must prevail, for the Jews as well as for the other inhabitants of the land. Yet the fact that Israel was able to reconstitute itself from the time dimension back to space is the art of adaptation that characterizes our history.

This does not mean that our contribution to the world civilizations is the highest or most beneficial; Greek art and philosophy, Arab medical advances, the Renaissance, the American and French Revolutions, the scientific and industrial revolutions and the evolution of Japan into a bridge between Oriental and Western cultures, to name only a few, are equally great and probably had more impact on more people.

What it means, however, is that the Jewish contribution is unique and should be an inspiration to oppressed and suffering nations all over the world. It shows that there is life after suffering and that a community can revitalize itself even after painful and constant losses.

Volume I of The Story of Civilizations, by Baruch Rand and Gail Baker, (Lola Stein Foundation) will be available in bookstores in May 2005.

The resurgence of Israel, the author writes, 'is the epitome of the skill of survival'.

A Mideast summer's dream

By an overwhelming majority of 407 to 9, members of the U.S. House of Representatives recently passed a resolution affirming their support for Israel. Co-sponsored by majority leader Tom DeLay and minority whip Steny Hoyer, the bipartisan motion endorsed the core principles articulated in President George W. Bush's April 14 letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Importantly, the resolution expressed an enduring commitment to maintaining Israel's sovereignty, "including secure, recognized, and defensible borders, and to preserving and strengthening the capability of Israel to deter enemies and defend itself against any threat". It also signalled approval for Israel's "right to take actions against terrorist organizations that threaten the citizens of Israel." Moreover, in addressing "a realistic framework for the solution to the Palestinian refugee issue," it refers to "the establishment of a permanent alternative" rather than any right of return to Israel.

Less than 24 hours after the motion's passage, the U.S. Senate passed a similar one by a 95–3 margin.

That both houses of the U.S. Congress took these initiatives reflects a certain consistency – and a commitment to doing what is right rather than what is expedient.

Under the aegis of CIJA-PAC, the Canada-Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress and Federation, I had the opportunity to participate in a range of meetings with candidates from each of our three major political parties as they prepared for the federal election. The relationship between Canada and Israel was obviously high on our agenda, and within the context of pre-election pledges and platitudes, it was not too surprising that all the candidates we interviewed, regardless of party affiliation, expressed enthusiasm for positions that would not only strengthen Canada-Israel ties but also lend active support to Israel's quest to suppress terrorism and protect its people.

But for the cynics among us, it seems less than likely that the epiphanies of pre-election exuberance will translate into meaningful policy change once our new government takes shape. For this to occur, it would require a quantum leap from Canada's perceived commitment to so-called "balance" – usually manifested as bias against Israel – that has been a cornerstone of our foreign policy for decades. It would also require an essential shift away from Canada's fixation with supporting United Nations resolutions that routinely condemn the Jewish state.

What is highly doubtful, however, is that any new configuration in Parliament will have even the slightest inclination to begin to re-evaluate the fundamentals of Canada's foreign policy, especially as it relates to the Middle East.

It therefore remains no more than an appealing summer fantasy that Canada might soon follow the U.S. example in embracing a strong and principled stand on Israel.

Risking everything for the dream of dreams

After my more than 30 years in Israel, I can't but wonder who it is speaking here to the readership of the Canadian Jewish News: Is it a Canadian Israeli, a Canadian in Israel, or an Israeli born in Canada?

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

My sense is that, superficialities aside, there's not a whole lot of Canadian-ness left in me anymore, and what little there is has been squeezed into a back corner of my consciousness. Israeli life is too intense and engrossing to allow for much more.

And so my familiarity with the contemporary Canadian scene is at best sketchy, and probably only somewhat more accurate than, say, the familiarity of most Canadian Jews with the living, breathing Israel.

Viewed from afar, Canada is enticing – tranquil, watery, forested, spacious and affluent. I also imagine it as being well governed, efficiently run (relatively speaking) and, most importantly, a place where one can plan for one's children's future with the solid assurance that the future will be there – and one's children will be there to live it. All this makes for an almost utopian never-never-land, when judged from an Israeli perspective.

It is no great surprise, therefore, that I periodically take the temperature of my soul to better understand why it is I remain so stubbornly enamoured of, and committed to this tiny, difficult country. It's the same conclusion always: namely, that, undoubtedly, my life would have been immeasurably poorer had I shown more sense as a young man, listened to good advice and stayed put in Toronto.

Excuse me for saying so, but I feel extremely fortunate that I was not very level-headed or sensible. I am convinced that Israel is the main event of contemporary Jewish history.

There are flashes of realization that are truly the great gift of this land to me. They make everything – the stress, the grief, the disappointments, frustrations and tragedy – a price worth paying. They sneak up on me when least expected – while talking with my children in that absurdly, wonderfully implausible language of Hebrew, or while doing something so extraordinarily ordinary as touching some artefact fashioned by Jewish hands thousands of years ago. For the sheer grandeur of this undertaking of Jewish national rebirth is breathtaking, and the fact that I, myself, played a direct, if modest, role in it is exhilarating.

I now recognize that a mysterious inevitability governed the course of my life. My grandparents, accustomed to the hardships of eastern Europe, wholly embraced the Promised Land of Canada. Yet something sweet, dreamy and insatiable trickled down from them into me, driving me out of that newfound Garden of Eden. Could there have been anything more perverse, on the surface of it, than a pampered Toronto boy opting for the sort of existential uncertainty they so eagerly fled?

But there was an instant of clairvoyance for me during the battles on Mount Hermon in the springtime of 1974; things came together. We were being subjected to heavy mortar bombardment by the Syrians, and I wondered to myself, not without irony, whether I was going to survive my first year in the country.

The life-and-death nature of the situation called to mind my grandfather's intrigues a full century earlier, in trying to avoid conscription into the Czarist military for the 15-year stint of service that awaited young Jewish men, and the not unlikely prospect, as he expressed it, "of a pointless death in a totally irrelevant Russian campaign."

Then and there, shells exploding all around, my eyes filled with tears as I thanked my lucky stars for the immense privilege of being exactly where I was, doing exactly what I was doing, risking my everything for the dream of dreams of long generations.

Romantic? Maybe. But this kind of awareness has the power to sustain and inspire when the going gets rough, when you once again get that dull, throbbing dread in the pit of your stomach. And so you think it over some more, weighing this against that, what might have been against what is, and can't but conclude that what you have done and seen is so much grander, so much more fun than… well, being anywhere else, however pleasant, and missing out on it all.

An important statement from Israel's religious leaders

On the 17th of Tammuz – July 6 this year – thousands of Israelis gathered in Jerusalem's central square for what can best be described as a teach-in. This fast day commemorates the day that the city walls were first breached by Nebuchadnezzar (586 BCE) and, like Tisha B'Av, is a reminder of the dangers of catastrophic civil conflict between the remnants of the Jewish people in Israel.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

While media attention has focused on the intense political conflict between proponents and opponents of the plan to withdraw from Gaza and dismantle settlements, this event had a different agenda. It was designed to increase the awareness among Israelis in general, and the religious community, in particular, about the plight of the unemployed and chronically poor elements of society.

The worldwide economic decline was exacerbated in Israel by almost four years of Palestinian terrorism, and these factors have resulted in closed factories, a major jump in unemployment and many poor people who live below the poverty line. Reductions in government subsidies for health, education and other basic services, which were made necessary by the economic crisis itself, increased the difficulties faced by many families.

During this period, community groups have tried to fill the gap through voluntary public assistance programs. Food collection centres have sprung up in many places, and on Fridays in many Jerusalem neighbourhoods, youth groups distribute groceries to needy families. These are important measures, but they do not address issues such as the growing gap between rich and poor, the abuse of low-paid workers, trafficking in women (particularly from eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union), government corruption, and other dysfunctional but often hidden aspects of Israeli society.

The gathering in Jerusalem was first and foremost a way to draw attention to these important social issues. At the same time, the prominent presence of a number of rabbis and other religious figures also reflects the growing realization that this leadership has ignored the humanitarian traditions of the Jewish prophets. Instead, the "national religious" parties and associated rabbis have focused their influence primarily on divisive political issues – borders, settlements, war and peace, etc. At the same time, the haredi leadership has been seen as limited to its own community, playing politics to get its share of the state budget while avoiding the broader social and economic situation.

All of which highlights the potential importance of the statements made at the Jerusalem gathering, combined with the other activities that focus on the Israeli and social and economic agenda. In contrast to the Diaspora, where rabbis are needed as synagogue leaders and family counsellors, these roles are of lesser importance in Israel. Instead, the country is sorely in need of social leaders – not affiliated with particular parties, interests, or ideologies – who can address broader problems. By publicly confronting these issues, the organizers and speakers demonstrated that they recognize their responsibility.

The messages they delivered were mixed, as might be expected for a social movement that is just getting off the ground, even if it is based on thousands of years of tradition. But at the same time, the theme of the day demonstratively avoided the standard and ineffective demand that someone else – usually "the government" – provide solutions.

Governments in general, Israel's included, are notoriously ineffective at dealing with these difficult social issues, and they tend to stifle individual ingenuity, create dependency, and are susceptible to corruption. The million olim from the former Soviet Union know this all too well and are strong supporters of private initiative and self-reliance.

The emphasis is not on a return to the failed reliance on a paternal government, but on greater individual social involvement consistent with the Jewish tradition. The theme of the day was based on the biblical commandment that each person must accept responsibility to take "the right and good action" – without waiting for instructions. The broad purpose was to return the attention of Israelis to the goal of building a just society and being "a light unto the nations."

This August, Toronto may once again be targetted by missionaries. We anticipate Jews for Jesus and Chosen People Ministries will take to the streets of our city to distribute their missionary literature.

In response to this threat, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafleting campaign to alert and educate the public. We are seeking to train volunteers who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner.

If you would like to participate in this program and/or help support our vital work, please contact:

RJCO reaches out to smaller Jewish communities across Ontario

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

While the Jews scattered across Saskatoon, Cornwall or Moncton would fill only a few blocks of certain Toronto neighbourhoods, they are all equally significant to the understanding of our ethnic identity in the Diaspora, said Bruce Kurta, director of development and community relations for Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO).

A four-year-old partnership between UIA Federations Canada and the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, RJCO is committed to raising funds and providing services for 27 of Ontario's small Jewish communities, ranging in size from 10 to 350 families.

Kurta said the expression, "Kol Israel areivim zeh b'zeh" – "All of Israel is responsible for each other" – reflects RJCO's mission. "Whether you're a Jew in Thunder Bay or Niagara Falls, we're one province. No one should turn their back on another," he said.

"It is difficult to appreciate the tensions and dynamics of ethnic survival in a community of 10 or 20 or even 100 Jewish households, when one's reference is only to communities where there are 50,000 fellow Jews," says RJCO's website, adding that it would be naive not to be concerned about the major obstacles these people face – including discrimination and assimilation.

According to the current edition of RJCO's online newsletter, MaKoreh, "In some communities, the population is dwindling and we must do everything possible... to allow them to carry on with the traditions that are so important to Jewish people."

Kurta said by offering educational programs and learning tools to children, parents and teachers, RJCO has helped strengthen the relationships between Jews at home and abroad.

One of the organization's most recent endeavours involved broadening the boundaries of Toronto's Holocaust Education Week to the communities of Kingston, St. Catharines, Barrie, Newmarket, Belleville, Oshawa and Peterborough.

"By offering programs that were open to the community at large [testimony of Holocaust survivors, video screenings and education about anti-Semitism], we were able to deliver important and timeless messages about Holocaust education for today's society," says the current edition of the RCJO newsletter.

The Janusz Korczak and the Children of the Warsaw Ghetto exhibit, documenting the life of one of the world's first advocates of children's rights, was acquired by the RJCO from the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre.

Korczak, a Polish-Jewish writer, physician and educator, became a heroic figure in 1942 when he refused offers for his own rescue from the Warsaw ghetto and devoted his life to hundreds of orphans who eventually perished at the Treblinka death camp.

The exhibit was launched in six Ontario communities and has been seen by thousands of Jews and non-Jews, Kurta said. "We had student groups that triple booked. It was the biggest coup of the year."

Through Dor L'Dor: Parent-Teen Dialogue, RJCO educates community members and fosters communication between the generations. Parents and their post bar/bat mitzvah teenagers, along with facilitators, meet for discussions of such topics as children and the Holocaust and Jewish values and ethics.

RJCO has also delivered educational consultant services to Jewish supplementary schools in the regions and provides a resource library and Jewish media centre.

For adults, a lecture series, followed by open discussion, includes speakers Eli Rubenstein, national director for March of the Living; Lance Davis, director of leadership development for UIA Federations Canada; Michael Soberman, national director for Canada Israel Experience; and Rotem Ayalon, an RJCO shaliach.

Families have been encouraged to participate in RJCO's Family Education Outreach Program – a home-study system geared toward Jewish parents with children ages three to 13. Weekly packages filled with songs, stories, recipes, games and information on a range of Jewish topics are sent to subscribers for a year.

Kurta said RJCO has been especially concerned with Jewish teenagers living in outlying areas. The organization, with the help of its program co-ordinator, Fauna Mandel, has developed the High School Outreach Program to address the feelings of isolation that these young people have experienced in predominantly non-Jewish environments.

The program runs on a three-year cycle, bonding Jewish teens through Shabbatons, a five-week summer tour in Israel and a trip to the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

"By the third year, the participants have formed a special chevrah, which they continue to develop without our assistance," says RJCO's website.

Kurta said the organization has also encouraged students to participate in March of the Living and Birthright Israel trips. Scholarships are available through UJA funding.

"So far, we've had very positive feedback from the public," Kurta said. "The Jewish communities are small, but they're vibrant and active."

He said one of the best examples of small-town Jewish pride was at a rally against hate crimes in Kitchener, where more than 700 people gathered to show their support.

A similar protest in Toronto brought out about 3,000 people, but considering the size of Kitchener, the numbers are proportionate, Kurta said.

"Nowhere have communities come together closer than in our communities," said Richard Kizell, RJCO chair.

Beckerman translates survivor's Holocaust memoirs

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Nightmares: Memoirs of the Years of Horror Under Nazi Rule in Europe, 1939-1945 by Holocaust survivor Konrad Charmatz has been published in English translated from the original Yiddish.

Miriam Beckerman

Charmatz, a Yiddish newspaper editor, was a friend and colleague of writer Eli Wiesel's.

Translated by Miriam Dashkin Beckerman, the book includes a statement of praise by writer Eli Wiesel, who notes the importance of the translation.

At a recent launch of Nightmares (Syracuse University Press) at Israel's, the Judaica Centre, on Eglinton Avenue, Charmatz's daughter, Esther Birenzweig, read an excerpt from the book.

Beckerman met Charmatz's wife, Sara, several years ago, after she saw a copy of the Yiddish Forward in the mail room of the Toronto condominium in which she lives, addressed to Sara Charmatz.

"I went to give Mrs. Charmatz the newspaper and we became acquainted. She told me about her late husband, who died in 1986, and his Yiddish memoirs. Subsequently, she gave me his book to read," Beckerman said. "The rest is history." Sara Charmatz commissioned her to translate Nightmares, which was edited by Matthew Kudelka.

An award-winning translator, Beckerman received a 1998 prize from the Dora Teitelbaum Foundation Inc. in Coral Gables, Fla., for her accomplishments in translation. She said if it were not for translations, "many things would be lost to future generations."

Beckerman is steeped in Yiddish. She was raised in a Yiddish-speaking home, surrounded by Yiddish books and newspapers, and attended the Farband Folkshule in the 1930s. An ardent Zionist in her teens, she trained at the Smithville Hachsharah farm to prepare for making aliyah.

In 1947, Beckerman went to Kfar Blum, a kibbutz in the Upper Galilee, where she met and married an Israeli pioneer fighter and member of the Haganah, Moshe Beckerman. He had been a prisoner of war and had earned a medal fighting in the Palestine regiment of the British 8th Army in World War II.

Their son Nonny was born in Tel Aviv the year the State of Israel was established. Today, both of Beckerman's sons, Nonny and Dan, live in Toronto, while her daughter, Rina Kafri, lives in Rishon Letzion.

The Beckermans visited Toronto in 1952 "so Moshe could meet my parents," she said. "We originally planned to come here for only a year or two, but as so [often] happens, we ended up staying in Toronto. However, we visited Israel at least 10 times before Moshe passed away in 1993, and I continue to do so regularly."

Beckerman worked at the Canadian Jewish Congress as a bilingual secretary and began translating as a hobby. Her first translation appeared in Lifestyles magazine in 1986. Before long, she started receiving requests for her translations from around the world.

A grandmother of six, Beckerman attended York University as a mature student, receiving an honours degree in English literature in 1995.

In 1998, she participated in the Vilnius Program in Yiddish Language and Literature at the Centre for Judaic Studies at Vilnius University, in co-operation with the Jewish community of Lithuania. In 2000, she studied Yiddish literature at the University of California in Los Angeles.

Beckerman's translations include letters, short stories, full manuscripts, and an ever-growing list of Holocaust memoirs and yizkor books.

A member of the American Literary Translators Association, Beckerman has taught Yiddish at Adath Israel Congregation. She is a member of Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Friends of Yiddish.

She also serves as a volunteer facilitator for Yiddish conversation groups at Carefree Lodge and for the day-care program of Baycrest Centre's Wagman Centre.

"Last year, a 93-year-old man who was in one of my sessions came to me and emotionally told me that he hadn't heard Yiddish since he heard his parents speak. It was so meaningful to me," Beckerman said.

"It is so gratifying to hear people tell me how much they appreciate what I am doing."

CJN staffer gets a surprise living-room makeover

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Honey Mahl, a Canadian Jewish News sales representative, was "busted" recently on the doorstep of her Toronto home and turned over to the authorities by her three daughters, Jill, Tammy and Melanie.

The crime: bad taste in home decorating.

Arresting officers: the design police.

The sentence: a one-room makeover by the hosts of Arresting Design, a lifestyle television show that gives a new identity to a space gone wrong.

Barb Margetts, the show's senior story producer, said that "in Honey's case, her living room was stuck in the '80s. Her Asian theme may have been stylish in 1986, but it was way too dated for 2004."

Mahl's youngest daughter, Melanie, watches Arresting Design, and was the main informant of her mother's design disasters. She is responsible for plotting the bust, said Margetts.

In an e-mail to the show before the makeover, Melanie exposed the crime scene. "My parents moved into their house in 1983. In those days, when our living room was decorated, I think we all agreed that the room looked fabulous. Who wouldn't love a Chinese-themed room with ceramic statues made over 20 years ago, and maroon couches with beige trees growing through them?"

The living room Melanie called "horrendous" took another beating in a questionnaire she completed to qualify Mahl for the show.

"Also in the room is the small couch near the window. It belongs to the dogs" she wrote. "We love that they have their little couch and they love it, too… but when did this room become their room?"

Melanie said her mother made an attempt at redecorating two years ago, but became preoccupied.

"She recarpeted and got excited to update. However, things got busy. I moved out, my sister [Jill] had another baby, and before we knew it, my mom put aside her living room, and once again put us first," she said.

So for once, Melanie and her sisters insisted their mother be the centre of attention. Deciding to report Mahl was not a hard decision. The challenge was hiding what they were doing.

"Because the Mahl sisters and Honey are so close, keeping the secret for a month was a feat in itself," Margetts said.

"I'm usually such a yenta," said Mahl. "I normally find out everything!"

After a surprise visit from "design squad" members Tammy Schnurr and Jeffrey Fisher, Mahl was "shocked and touched," Margetts said. "It was an emotional moment."

Mahl said she was "blown away" by the bust. "It was beyond my wildest dreams."

Despite the apprehension of some of her friends, Mahl said she was "not nervous in the least" about letting designers, camera crews, carpenters and truckloads of supplies "buzz around" her home.

"I wanted to go with the flow," she said. "I was excited the whole time."

Mahl was luxuriously "imprisoned" for a night at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, while the Arresting Design team worked 24 hours straight to redo her living room, said Margetts.

"I kept calling home and asking how it looked, but no one would tell me anything," Mahl said. "They just kept saying, 'You'll see tomorrow.'"

When Mahl was finally invited to return, she said she was "taken aback." She described the transformation of her living room as "classy and elegant."

While a few of Mahl's original furnishings were kept for sentimental reasons, she said the room was "stripped from top to bottom."

Her walls were repainted powder blue, a mirrored fireplace was built from scratch, cushions were sewn and finishes were put on old tables, she said.

"When I walked in, candles were everywhere. The whole room glowed," said Mahl.

Her two dogs were even accounted for: they can watch the world go by on a gold-trimmed velvet throne that's now beside the window, she said.

That first night, Mahl said she had a "showing" of her living room and added that the changes still continue to amaze guests.

"I felt bad when the crew had to leave," said Mahl. "They exuded so much energy and it was a fabulous experience for the whole family."

If Melanie hadn't sent out an SOS to the show's producers, Mahl said she would not have realized the extent of her design violations.

"Before, nothing was torn or shabby, everything was just from the early '80s. One decorator told me I had 'bold taste,'" she said.

"I've now learned that I can mix styles, like modern and traditional. And I learned that I'm not supposed to wait 20 years to redecorate a room," said Mahl.

On Mother's Day, Mahl's daughters told her a gift was on the way. They said it would arrive within a few weeks, and she would either love it or hate it.

"I was thinking a spa trip or something like that," she said. "Then when all this happened, I was thrilled. I can't wait until Mother's Day next year."

Mahl's Arresting Design episode will be aired this September on the W Network. The show is currently in its third season and contestants are in demand.

"We are looking for real characters in the widest variety of ages, relationships and ethnic groups," said Margetts.

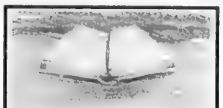
Jewish Life

Bound by words

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

In this week's double parshah, Matot-Masei, we encounter the subject of uttering a vow (neder) or swearing an oath. Jewish law is very specific in distinguishing between a vow and an oath.

The vow mentioned in the Torah refers to a person who prohibits himself or herself personal use of an object that would otherwise be permitted. Whereas, an oath (shvuah) confirms the validity of a statement or a condition regarding the person who swears. The common denominator is that they both bind the will (soul) of one who formulates specific words, as the Torah states in Bamidbar 30:3: "If a man vows a vow unto God, or swears an oath to bind his will, he may not make his word void; he must do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth."



Rabbinic Reflections

This law is equally binding on men and women, with the exception of a young woman living in her father's home who has the status of a na'arah. She can have her vow annulled by her father upon hearing her uttering a vow of abstention, provided that it is done the same day (till sundown) from the time he heard it. Should the father refrain from annulling her vow, she is obligated to uphold it.

The na'arah state lasts until six months after she attains puberty. From this point on, she has the status of a maiden (bogeret) and is considered to be mature enough to understand the implication of her vow.

A husband can annul his wife's vow on the grounds that the vow might interrupt the normal course of marriage. If the husband hears her formulate a vow and does not annul it that day, she is required to keep her word. The Torah grants this right to the father and husband on the grounds of compassion and concern for the welfare of family relations (shalom bayit).

The laws of vows and oaths are very specific and complicated. Even more complex are the laws for absolving and annulling them. Vows can be absolved only by a Torah scholar who attempts to find an "opening" (petach).

An "opening" is halachically derived through investigative techniques. The Torah scholar attempts to discover if the person was cognizant of the consequences and considerations of such a vow at the time of formulating it. Once a sense of regret has been awakened, with the obvious inability to keep this vow, the talmid chacham, having used "investigative discernment," gives a hetter (permission) and thus absolves the person from keeping the vow.

It should be made clear that the Torah scholar does not have the power to remove the vow, but only to find an opening and hence declare to the person that the vow had never been binding from the start since it was made in haste and in thoughtlessness, without truly understanding the consequences.

What is the Torah trying to teach us with the laws of neder? To arrive at an understanding, we must realize that what distinguishes a human being from any other creature is the possession of the faculties of reason and speech, or as the Torah words it in Bereshit 2:7, "And the Eternal God formed man, dust of the ground and blew into his nostrils the breath of life and so man became a living personality."

Onkelos, a famous Torah commentator, translates the words lenefesh chayah to leruach memalah, a speaking soul, and Rashi likewise comments that man is above all animals by the distinguishing faculties of de'ah vedibur, of reasoning and speech.

Chazzal, our sages, teach us that the power of human speech has a binding and twofold effect on the person who utters words for good or evil and the person to whom those words are directed.

No wonder the Chafetz Chaim was so careful to teach us about the dangers of slander (lashon hara). A person has the power to bless or to destroy, by virtue of these God-given faculties.

HaShem wanted us to know that our words bind our souls and we are held accountable for every utterance. In light of these statements, one can have an idea of the power of the Kol Nidrei service we recite on the Erev Yom Kippur. All our vows are annulled and we are free to pray in purity.

May HaShem grant us the power to use our words wisely and help us glorify His Torah in the world.

Rabbi David Cadoch is a talmid of HaRav HaGaon R. Leib Baron shlita of Montreal and a chaver of the Rabbinical Council of Canada and Rabbinical Council of America.

Jews largely unknown, alien to Henry James

The Master by Colm Toibin, McClelland & Stewart, $35.

Henry James (1843-1916), the protagonist of this superb and impressive novel, was born in New York City, but spent his childhood and youth travelling between Europe and America.

His family was wealthy, highly creative and influential. His father was a well-known, if idiosyncratic, intellectual; his invalid sister, an admired diarist; and his elder brother, William, a founder of modern psychology and one of the eminent philosophers of the day.

Books
Bernard Baskin

For James, like most members of his social class, Jews were largely unknown and alien. Condescension and the inability to see the Jew as an individual, rather than as a type, is evinced by his fiction.

He was disgusted by the false accusations made against Captain Alfred Dreyfus in the famous French treason case. In 1904, however, in a visit to the east side of New York City, confronted by a teeming, concentrated Jewish immigrant population, his reactions were less than humane or compassionate.

James eventually settled in England, and so it is not surprising that his recurring themes include the confrontation between new-world innocence and old-world sophistication and the comedy and tragedy that can result when two people from different environments meet.

The Master is set from 1895 to1899, when James was in his 50s, the writing of his best-known novels still before him. It is a period of self-doubt, regret, guilt and unremitting ambition.

In the late 1890s, he wrote a number of plays that were badly received. When Goy Domnille was produced, the London audience booed and hissed when he appeared. It was an experience from which he never fully recovered.

Prodigiously prolific, he wrote six to eight hours every day and produced an imposing body of work: novels, short stories, notebooks, an autobiography, plays, literary criticism and travel reportage.

For the most part, his style was baroque, his sentences clotted and convoluted. But he was, undoubtedly, one of the major novelists of the 20th century.

Leon Edel, in his famous biography of James, wrote, "The secret of his enduring fame was simple: he had dealt exclusively with the myth of civilization; he had written about men and women in their struggle to control their emotions and passions within the forms and manners of society. He understood human motive and behaviour and was the first of the modern psychological novelists… He had shown how artists take the chaos of life and shape it into forms that endure."

Toibin structures his novel around a series of episodes in James' emotional life and how his reactions to them became woven into his creative vision. Determined to sustain his writer's privacy, he withdrew emotionally from a number of women who suffered from his calculated remoteness.

Minny Temple, a charismatic young cousin, died of tuberculosis after James had sidestepped her suggestion that she accompany him to Rome, where she might have recovered. Constance Fenimore Woolson, an American writer with whom James had a warm, 14-year friendship, committed suicide in Venice after James withdrew, in spite of apparently promising to take a house with her there. His guilt haunted him for years. The reader senses the anguish of a man of feeling who did not dare to commit himself to physical love.

In one of the book's moving scenes, an admirer expresses amazement at how much James has written. "Did you always know that you would write all these books?" he asks. And, "Did you not once plan it all? Did you not say, this is what I will do with my life?" Suddenly, James is confronted with the sterility of his existence and his unresolved sexual identity. He turns away rather than answer these questions, "with no idea why his eyes had filled with tears."

Against the background of 19th- century landscapes in Paris, London and Venice, Toibin has fashioned a taut and gracefully plotted novel, a melding of biography and fiction, that brings us close to the mind and art of an elusive and enigmatic personality.

Jewish Life

Readers write – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

From angels to righteous tzaddikim to Jewish news read by computers, readers of this column have eclectic interests on the World Wide Web. Here are some sites they think you should know about.

Do you believe in angels? Judy Silver, a librarian in London, Ont., writes: "For many years I have been interested in angels. I started collecting them. After a while, I thought it was time that I learned about them… To my surprise, angels did have a place in Judaism. So, I thought that there would be a great deal of information on the Internet about angels in Judaism. However, there was very little… So, I thought I would create a website devoted to the topic." Silver traces the importance of angels in the Torah, prayer, midrash and Kabbalah, and explains why rabbis used to downplay the significance of angels. She also links to other interesting sites, including the tale of a doctor and the patient who made her believe in angels. [www.freewebs.com/jewishangels/]

Here's a project that may convince you about angels – the flesh and blood kind. Rena Cohen (formerly of Calgary and Toronto) writes from Safed: "As the rest of Israel, we are in deep trouble because of the lack of tourism and all kinds of government cutbacks. We are sadly reporting a tremendous growth in the… working poor." The Lamed-Vuvnik organization tries to address some of these problems by funding people who are trying to make a difference. Like, Clara, the "Chicken Lady of Jerusalem." Clara never set out to help people. She fell into it when she saw a butcher give a young girl a bag of bones. She commented that it was nice of the butcher to give away scraps for pets. He explained that the girl uses the bones for soup and cholent. Horrified, Clara secretly gave him money to give the girl meat each week. That was 17 years ago. Now, the Chicken Lady helps some 200 families and is one of the people who gets funding from Lamed-Vuvnik. [www.lamedvuvnik.org]

By the way, the term "Lamed-Vuvnik" refers to the Jewish belief that there are 36 (the numerical value of the letters lamed and vav) tzaddikim living in each generation doing secret acts of kindness. "Tradition tells that on the merit of these 36 people, God sustains the world from generation to generation."

Speaking of tzaddikim, you can probably identify biblical figures such as Abraham, Moses, Sarah or Esther. But what about Belshazzar, Nimrod, Tamar or Yocheved? I received an e-mail from a reader named Benyamin recommending "Torah from Dixie's 'People of the Book,' a terrific sub-section of an excellent Jewish website." It offers short bibliographies of some of the lesser known personalities in the Torah. For instance, Nimrod was the great-grandson of Noah and the instigator behind the the Tower of Babel. Yocheved was the mother of Miriam, Aaron and Moses. Sages also say she was one of the midwives who risked her life to save newborn Jewish boys after Pharaoh's decree of death. [www.tfdixie.com/pbook.htm]

Brian Torobin writes "Ever since I subscribed to my high-speed Internet service, I have found the websites of the Israel Broadcasting Authority [http://bet.iba.org.il/reshetbet.ram], and of IDF Radio [http://gifs.msn.co.il/media/glz.wma] enormously useful in keeping me up to date with life in Israel… Between the news, the programming is full of political discussions, personal profiles, news interviews, soccer game broadcasts, phone-in shows and sometimes (always on chagim) Israeli music… By hooking up some decent computer speakers… you can close your eyes and pretend you are really in Israel!"

On a related note, a while back I told you about Lawrence Grossman's Jewish Webcasting Guide, with its links to more than 100 Jewish or Hebrew sites with audio or video content. [http://jewishwebcasting.com/] Recently, he wrote me about his latest project: he takes news from the Jewish Telegraphic Agency and has a computer read it aloud using text-to-speech software. If you think computers still sound like HAL from 2001: A Space Odyssey, you will be surprised at how artificial speech can mimic a human voice. Says Grossman: "I think the quality is good enough… that a very economical 'radio' news webcast could be created daily… this would be a great advance for Jewish communications."

If you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website, or have created your own, e-mail me at the address below and I may mention it in a future column.

Summer reading for the Jewish mind

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

It's time for my annual summer reading suggestions on topics of Jewish worth.

Essential Essays on Judaism by Eliezer Berkovits reveals a remarkably supple approach to problems of Jewish law and nationhood. The cliché "ahead of his time," so hackneyed in many contexts, is richly appropriate here, as Rabbi Berkovits delves into areas that are risky and complex, such as the response of halachah to modern life and a brilliant formulation of Jewish sexual ethics. The collection is an always-intelligent quest for truth.

In a totally different stylistic vein is Adjusting Sights, the enormously moving memoir/spiritual odyssey by Haim Sabato. (The prose of the original Hebrew is even more rewarding than the able translation into English.) Sabato's title speaks to a flexible metaphor that describes his harrowing experience as a tank operator in the Yom Kippur War and his grappling with matters of faith forever after.

Marc Shapiro has penned a new book on Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith called The Limits of Orthodox Theology: Maimonides' Thirteen Principles Reappraised, which though exhaustive and passionate, can't quite escape the feeling that the author has an axe to grind. His earlier biography of the Seridei Aish, Rabbi Yehiel Yaakov Weinberg, titled Between the Yeshiva World and Modern Orthodoxy, is a towering accomplishment that highlights the challenges Rav Weinberg faced in negotiating with modernity.

Modern American Jewish fiction has been driven by the obsessions of writers such as Philip Roth and Saul Bellow, revelling in a kind of worship of the gods of American freedom and sexual licence. Dara Horn's In the Image is a refreshing change from those motifs, as she weaves a multi-generational story that draws on many Jewish texts, ancient and current, religious and secular. Even more remarkable is the fact that she penned this novel in her early 20s.

The topic of the afterlife has often been assigned to the realm of Christianity in popular Jewish consciousness, but Rabbi Neil Gillman's The Death of Death: Resurrection and Immortality in Jewish Thought is a careful and engaging work that brings the theme forward as central to Jewish theology. The questions of whether there is something eternal in us and what form our existence takes beyond this mortal vale are at the centre of Gillman's probings.

Perhaps the most original work of Jewish theology in a long time is the dense but masterful Expanding the Palace of Torah: Orthodoxy and Feminism by Tamar Ross, a professor of philosophy at Bar-Ilan University. Exploring highly charged issues based on the challenge to tradition posed by feminism and postmodern thought, Ross presents a serious examination of the problems and possible solutions posed by faith and traditional commitments in the modern world.

Every so often, I am haunted by the idea that no one reads at all any more in our high tech age. More's the pity. There are few things as deeply satisfying as immersing oneself in a great book and finding out that others share the same thoughts, questions and search for reality.

Jewish groups won't press for hate charges

If a swastika, for example, had been painted on the school, it might have been possible to lay a hate charge, he said.

Birnbaum thinks it is a "sad absurdity" that the persons accused in the spate of anti-Semitic graffiti and cemetery desecrations in the Toronto area have had hate crimes charges laid against them, when a violent act against a Jewish institution doesn't qualify.

The situation points to the need for possible amendments to the Criminal Code, Birnbaum said.

B'nai Brith legal counsel Steven Slimovitch says the UTT attack was "racist, that's not debatable," but definitely does not fall under the hate crimes provisions of the Code. Yet, he said he has no problem with the law as it is.

"Taking into account hate motivation as an 'aggravating factor' in sentencing is an excellent way to do it," he said, and is confident that will happen in this case.

In targeting a Jewish school allegedly because of something Israel has done, the perpetrators are not merely making a political statement, but are, in effect, saying "We are getting you Jews for it," Slimovitch said.

On the other hand, "if someone throws a molotov cocktail through the window of the Israeli embassy with a note 'Get out of the West Bank', it's not a hate crime."

In June, Ontario Attorney-General Michael Bryant added wilful promotion of hatred to the original charges of vandalism and mischief against the three teens arrested in March for a spate of anti-Semitic vandalism. They are an 18-year-old and two minors, aged 15. The Criminal Code requires the attorney-general to personally consent to hate crime charges.

The hate crime charge carries a sentence of up to two years imprisonment, in addition to the penalty for the other charges. Bryant said the judge can also consider hate motivation as an aggravating factor in handing down the sentences for the vandalism and mischief charges.

Lawyers for the three accused in the UTT case – Sleiman Elmerhebi and Simon Zogheib, both 18, and Elmerhebi's mother, Rouba Elmerhebi Fahd, 36 – are scheduled to be back in Quebec Court July 22 for a hearing.

Elmerhebi remains behind bars, while Zogheib is out on $20,000 bail and Elmerhebi Fahd on $10,000 bail. She is accused of being an accessory after the fact. On June 28, judge Serge Boisvert dropped one of the conditions of Elmerhebi Fahd's release that she have no contact with her son. She is now allowed to speak to her son under the supervision of their lawyers, but only in order to prepare their defence. The three have pleaded not guilty.

Crown prosecutor Anne Aube did not object to the relaxation, and neither did CJC or B'nai Brith.

"We are taking the lead of the Crown on this and respect the constitutional right of a full defence," said Birnbaum.

Slimovitch said he has no objection because Elmerhebi remains in custody and is not a flight risk.

Montreal police did, at least initially, consider the UTT incident a hate crime. At a press conference held the day after the April 5 incident, assistant police director Yves Surprenant termed the firebombing a "hate crime" based on the content of the note found at the scene.

Although the contents of the note were never released, it has been widely reported that the attack was said to be in retaliation for Israel's assassination of Hamas leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin and contained an implicit threat that the firebombing was carried out while the school was vacant, but that might not be the case in the future. The note, however, did not explicitly mention Jews.

At the same press conference, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler vowed to bring "the full force of the law to bear" on the perpetrators of what he termed "racist hate crimes."

Hate propaganda is found under sections 318 and 319 of the Criminal Code, which are headed, respectively, "advocating genocide" and "public incitement of hatred." To convict under these provisions, specific proof is required in both the act itself and in the intention, according to the University of Ottawa's Human Rights Research and Education Centre, whose website provides a primer on the law.

"It isn't enough that someone has said something hateful or untrue. The courts will only find someone guilty if they have done exactly what the Code says they can't do – and if they did it on purpose."

To be charged with incitement, the accused must have communicated a statement in a "public place" against an "identifiable group" and "in such a way that there will likely be a breach of the peace." A subsection also makes it a crime to communicate hatred in any way other than a private conversation, but the statement must be a wilful encouragement of others to hate an identifiable group.

A note left at the scene, quickly confiscated by police, with no apparent mention of "persons distinguished by their colour, race, religion or ethnic origin" may be the reason the Crown did not seek a hate charge, Slimovitch suggested, unlike the crimes committed in Toronto, which all could see.

The Criminal Code also permits the courts to take into account a motivation of hate as an aggravating factor when sentencing for other offences, such as damage to property or making threats, which usually results in a more severe punishment.

In addition, anti-terror legislation passed in 2001 created a new offence of mischief against places of religious worship or religious property "motivated by bias, prejudice or hate based on religion, race, colour, or national or ethnic origin." This provision has not been tested in the courts.

B'nai Brith community outreach coordinator Yoni Petel said the organization believes the section should be further amended to include religious schools. "In the wake of the UTT attack, we think this should definitely be revisited," he said.

B'nai Brith is also calling for "one clear national definition of hate crime. The problem is that police across the country are not using standardized criteria," he added.

Both CJC and B'nai Brith officials believe the Crown has a strong case against the three accused based on evidence heard during the bail hearings. That evidence is under a publication ban.

They also understand that police are continuing their investigation and further charges are possible.

"תעירי אותי בבקשה בחמש בבוקר".

כשתמעורר מושל"ח בבוקר הוא מגלה לתרדותו שהשעה היא 9 וחצי. מושה, ברוב עצבים הולך לחפש את מאשה לברר מה קרה לה, כשהוא מגלה פתק על המיטה:

"עכשיו חמש בבוקר, תקום בבקשה".

גברים פשוט אינם מתוחכמים מספיק לנתחרויות כאלה...

Homeless, not hopeless

By SHIRA STANLEIGH
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

My weekly interactions with Rick, a man recovering from a life of homelessness, have obliterated most of my preconceived notions about the people who routinely make the downtown streets of Toronto their humble abode.

I should begin by explaining how I met Rick. As an observant, bored history student at York University, I frequently volunteer with Ve'ahavta's street help van to relieve myself of the monotony of daily university life. One evening this past November, I was complaining to Darryl Borden, director of Ve'ahavta's homeless initiatives, about how food can only sustain a person physically, and that what the homeless also need is some intellectual stimulation.

Darryl responded with a challenge – his name was Rick. He'd been living on and off the streets for some years and avidly desired to return to adult day school, but needed some preliminary literacy work before he could do so. Despite the substantial 27-year age gap that divided us (Rick is 47 years old), we forged a sturdy friendship.

I was initially surprised by Rick's adamant interest in literacy, since he was the first homeless person I had encountered to profess such a passion for the written word. He insisted that I help him by meeting with him once a week to work on his reading and writing skills.

We met every Thursday for one hour at a downtown public library. Rick's interest extended further than the hypothetical. He diligently showed up week after week, gently chastising me if I was late. "Can I ask you She-era, why exactly are you late?" he would ask, delighting in his own ability to properly pronounce my somewhat unusual Hebrew name. I could only sputter a lame response.

Upon discovering that I was Jewish, Rick requested that we switch our reading material from Canadian history to literature about Canadian Jewry. I thought this was strange, but complied gladly – may as well utilize the Jewish day school education for something positive, right?

We began to study the history of Jews in Canada, and Rick was enlivened. He never missed a session, which is more than I can say for the class attendance record of the average York student.

Before Darryl, no one believed in Rick enough to invest any time in him. Given the opportunity, Rick was determined to prove that he was worthy.

Something about the tale of the many Jewish immigrants who started out as the underdogs – truly the lower order of Canadian society – and triumphed against all odds to become members of the country's elite within a number of decades seemed to touch Rick in a personal way.

It inspired him to know that other people could identify with his feelings of subordination and social segregation. He saw the Jewish situation as similar to his own, and it spurred him that much more to challenge himself to reach his potential.

Rick and I continue to learn weekly from each other. Our most recent excursion was to the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto in the Lipa Green Building. which gave us a more three-dimensional exposure to Jewish history.

Darryl and I have excitedly discussed the positive changes we've observed in Rick. His speech is more focused, his thoughts more collected, and his walk now borders on a swagger. It's as if he's been empowered by the knowledge of our community's hardships and ultimate ascension.

Because of Rick, I finally understand why Jews have a specific obligation to do tikkun olam (the repair of the world). We have a long history of being subordinated. Who can better understand the plight of today's societal underdogs? We've been there and done that, and now we have an obligation to aid those in dire circumstances.

Shira Stanleigh is entering her third year at York University.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Salad hits the spot on a hot day

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Miami is hot. In the summer, even sometimes in the winter, the air arcs off the streets radiating heat circles that bend but do not break as you walk though them, slowly.

My grandparents, Oma and Opa, bought an apartment in Miami Beach that my family of eight piled into for visits. It was a small unit with one bedroom and a galley kitchen emptying into a simply furnished dining and living area. But the centre courtyard that each of these tiny apartments faced was opened to the sky and bathed in Florida sun. And the beach and the Atlantic Ocean were only two lazy blocks away.

So when we got our driver's licences, my brothers and sisters and I would drive from our Atlanta home to Miami. Opa would find us a little room close by so that we could run around all day and night and touch base for meals or chats in between.

But for Saturday lunches, we came to them. Oma had an array of simple but wonderful dishes she prepared in advance to be eaten cold.

In the Miami heat, her cucumber dill salad was one of my favourites. It was always served in a rectangular glass container with gold flower foiling on the sides. The pale green slices were always perfectly thin and even. And when we sat together around the dim, unlit dining table, me sunburned and tired from the day before, her cool salad felt like a mint mist, a slow fan. Outside their window, the palm leaves baked yellow in the sun, but inside, eating pale green cucumber circles with my Oma and Opa, I experienced a moment when there was nothing I'd rather do.

OMA'S CUCUMBER DILL SALAD

My grandmother marinated her cucumbers in distilled white vinegar, but I replaced it with rice vinegar for a less sharp taste. She also cooked with a very light hand when it came to spices, so play with the seasonings until the salad is perfect and refreshing for you.

2 large cucumbers (approx. 4 cups sliced)
2 tbsp. rice vinegar
1 tbsp. water
1/8 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. sugar
pinch of white pepper
fresh dill (approx. 1-2 tbsp.)

Peel skin off cucumbers and slice thinly. Arrange in long rectangular sealable container. In small bowl whisk vinegar, water, salt, sugar and pepper. (Season to your taste, but don't add too much salt as it draws liquid from the cucumbers.) Pour vinegar mixture over cucumbers and mix well. Cut fresh dill and sprinkle over cucumbers. Close container, toss to mix, and refrigerate overnight to marinate. Toss again before serving. Serves five as a side dish.

Mom's chicken nuggets and fingers

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

My son recently returned from his first trip to Israel. One of the most wonderful things about the Birthright program is that it exposes young adults to all the wonders of the country.

After describing his trip and the amazing time he had with all his friends, he talked about the kosher fried chicken he ate at a fast food restaurant.

I then made the following recipes of chicken nuggets and fingers and dipping sauces and showed him once and for all that no matter where he may roam, nobody cooks chicken quite like mom.

SIMPLE CHICKEN NUGGETS

1 1/2 lb. boneless skinless chicken breasts or thighs vegetable oil for deep frying
1/3 cup all-purpose flour
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 tsp. vinegar
1/4 tsp. baking soda
1/3 cup water

Cut chicken into nugget-size pieces. Put oil in deep fryer or put about 2 to 3 inches in a Dutch oven and heat to 360. Mix flour with salt in a small bowl. Mix vinegar with baking soda. Add vinegar mixture and water to the flour mixture; beat until smooth. Dip chicken pieces into batter; allow excess batter to drip off into the bowl. Fry chicken nuggets, 4 to 6 at a time, until golden brown, or about 4 minutes for each batch. Serves 4. This recipe can be doubled or tripled

CRISPY COCONUT CHICKEN FINGERS

1 cup coconut
1/2 cup flour
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1/4 tsp. garlic powder
1 1/2 lb. boneless skinless chicken breasts cut in 1-in. strips
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/3 cup margarine, melted

Preheat oven to 400. In a bowl, combine the coconut, flour, salt, pepper and garlic powder. Dip the chicken strips into the beaten egg, then roll it in the coconut mixture. Place the coated chicken piece in a shallow baking pan. Drizzle with it with melted margarine. Bake for 25 minutes or until chicken is browned and cooked through, turning once. Serves 3 to 4.

Fence violates int'l law, parts must be dismantled, Hague rules

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The International Court of Justice ruled last week that Israel's West Bank security barrier contravenes international law, that parts of it must be dismantled, and that compensation must be paid to the Palestinian owners of property confiscated for its construction.

"The construction of the wall being built by Israel, the occupying Power, in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including in and around East Jerusalem, and its associated regime, are contrary to international law," the ruling says.

Fourteen justices supported the non-binding advisory decision and the sole opponent was the American judge, Thomas Buergenthal.

Israeli Justice Minister Tommy Lapid said Israel will not comply with the ruling, but will comply with its own court rulings, such as the June 30 High Court of Justice ruling ordering Israel to reroute a 30-kilometre stretch of the barrier northwest of Jerusalem. Later, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson said the court failed to address the issue of Palestinian terror in its ruling.

Meanwhile, a White House spokesperson brushed aside the ruling, saying the Bush administration doesn't think the court is the right forum for addressing what is a political issue.

In building the fence, the court said, Israel violated international humanitarian law by infringing on Palestinians' freedom of movement, freedom to seek employment, education and health.

It also said Israel violated international treaties it had signed that deal with these topics: "The construction of such a wall accordingly constitutes breaches by Israel of its various obligations under the applicable international humanitarian law and human rights instruments."

The court also ruled that Israel must halt construction of the fence and pull down those sections built inside the West Bank. "Israel is under an obligation to… cease forthwith the works of construction of the wall being built in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including in and around East Jerusalem, to dismantle forthwith the structure therein situated," the court said.

The judges also questioned the route of the fence determined by Israel, saying they are "not convinced that the specific course Israel has chosen for the wall was necessary to attain its security objectives."

The ruling says: "The wall, along the route chosen, and its associated regime, gravely infringe a number of rights of Palestinians residing in the territory occupied by Israel, and the infringements resulting from that route cannot be justified by military exigencies or by the requirements of national security or public order."

On the issue of compensating Palestinians harmed by construction of the fence, the court rules that "Israel is under an obligation to make reparation for all damage caused by the construction of the wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including in and around East Jerusalem."

Buergenthal was supported by the Dutch judge, Pieter Kooijmans, in his rejection of the call for all countries to act against the project. The other 13 judges ruled in favour of this call. "All States are under an obligation not to recognize the illegal situation resulting from the construction of the wall and not to render aid or assistance in maintaining the situation created by such construction," the ruling says.

The Hague court also ruled that it has jurisdiction to render an opinion on the issue of the fence. The ruling includes a lengthy analysis of the legal situation and of the history of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. Parts of the fence constructed within the Green Line are not included in the court's decision.

The ruling also says that "Israel is bound to comply with its obligation to respect the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and its obligations under international humanitarian law and international human rights law. Furthermore, it must ensure freedom of access to the Holy Places that came under its control."

The International Court was asked to address the issue of the security fence by a United Nations General Assembly resolution last December, and its decision will be presented to the world body. Israel, the United States and several dozen European nations have argued that the court, based in The Hague, lacks jurisdiction in the matter.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia welcomed the decision, saying, "This is an historic day and a historic decision."

PA President Yasser Arafat described the ruling as "a victory for the Palestinian people," while his aide Abu Rudeinah called for UN sanctions on Israel, saying, "As of today, Israel should be viewed as an outlaw state."

PA legislator Saeb Erekat noted the ruling is the ICJ's 26th, and that the previous 25 have been implemented.

For its part, the Defence Ministry has changed the official map marking the route of the fence according to the ruling of Israel's High Court of Justice. The changes run along the section of the fence northwest of Jerusalem, and in parts near Qalqilyah, Modi'in and southeast of Jerusalem near Gush Etzion.

According to the map made public by the Defence Ministry, there are many changes from the fence's original route, all meant to alleviate pressure on the Palestinian population in those areas.

But the new map also shows the intention to build the fence around Ariel, linking the West Bank's largest settlement with the settlements of Karnei Shomron and Immanuel and to the Green Line.

Israel won't comply with Hague fence ruling, Lapid says

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will not follow the International Court of Justice ruling against it on the West Bank security barrier, Justice Minister Yosef Lapid said last week.

After the ICJ handed down its decision, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson added that the court failed to address the issue of Palestinian terror in determining the barrier is illegal.

"[The ruling] fails to address the essence of the problem and the very reason for building the fence – Palestinian terror," the spokesperson told reporters.

The court ruled last Friday that the barrier contravenes international law, that parts of it must be dismantled, and that compensation must be paid to the Palestinian owners of property confiscated for its construction. The court confirmed the European Union's view that the fence is illegal and urged Israel to remove it from occupied territory.

Lapid said Israel would honour only its own court rulings, such as the June 30 High Court of Justice ruling ordering the defence establishment to reroute a 30-kilometre stretch of the barrier northwest of Jerusalem. The High Court ruled the fence is a security barrier rather than a political one, but that Israel must balance security considerations against the needs of local residents.

"Now, of course, there is the limitation the High Court of Justice imposed in Israel, and we will comply with our High Court decisions, and not with the panel of European Union nations, which are not exactly suspected of excessive sympathy for Israel," Lapid said.

The White House brushed aside the ruling, saying it didn't think the ICJ was the right forum for addressing the issue.

"We do not believe that that's the appropriate forum to resolve what is a political issue. This is an issue that should be resolved through the process that has been put in place, specifically the road map," White House spokesperson Scott McClellan said aboard Air Force One as President George W. Bush was en route to a campaign tour in Pennsylvania.

"We certainly recognize the need for Israel to defend itself and protect the people of Israel. It's also important that they allow the Palestinian people to move freely within that region," McClellan told reporters.

The national director of the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League, Abe Foxman, said, "We thought for a moment the court would rise above prejudice, but as it turns out, it didn't."

Meanwhile, New York senators Hillary Clinton and Charles Schumer were to deliver statements against the International Court's decision in front of UN headquarters in New York.

Last Friday, the Israeli-Arab Hadash party submitted a no-confidence motion to the government in the wake of reports of the ruling against the fence. Hadash head MK Mohammed Barakeh said if Israel ignored the ICJ ruling, it would continue to be an international pariah, Army Radio reported.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom held meetings with ministry officials last Friday to discuss Israel's reaction to the ruling, and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon held meetings on the issue Sunday.

Government spokesperson Avi Pazner said Israel will be ready to discuss the fence route after implementing the Gaza disengagement plan.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

A dynamic Israeli-based organization requires an energetic, self-starter to take direction from the Board of Directors, and be responsible for the overall planning of the British Columbia Chapter. Sharon calls Martin

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon telephoned Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin last week to congratulate him on his victory in the recent Canadian elections and wish him success in forming a new government. Sharon thanked his Canadian counterpart for his friendship with Israel and the Jewish people, and for the solidarity that the Canadian government has shown with Israel. Sharon invited Martin to visit Israel. The pair also discussed the dangers of global terrorism, the Gaza disengagement plan and other issues, and agreed to strengthen bilateral relations.

Knesset elections sooner

The High Court of Justice ruled last week that elections for the 17th Knesset will be held in November 2006, not November 2007. But Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin (Likud) said the elections would likely be before the 2006 deadline if Prime Minister Ariel Sharon does not cobble together a new majority coalition. Sharon has told associates he plans to run for prime minister again in the next elections. If elected, it would be his third term.

Middle class shrinking

A report published last week by an Israeli research centre found the Israeli middle class shrank between 15 per cent and 19 per cent in the 1990s. The margin of error stems from two different methods used to determine the size of the middle class. Hundreds of thousands of people from the former Soviet Union immigrated to Israel in the 1990s, likely influencing the numbers.

Bloody clashes

Eight Palestinians were killed and more than 20 others were wounded by the Israel Defense Forces during fierce fighting in the Gaza Strip's Beit Hanun area last Thursday. An Israeli soldier was wounded. In a separate incident Thursday, five IDF soldiers were wounded when a mine exploded near a jeep. Two Palestinians were killed by the IDF in the West Bank Friday Earlier in the week, two Palestinian gunmen were killed in Gaza and an Israeli commando and four Palestinians were killed in Nablus.

Sharon, Peres to discuss unity

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon invited interim Labor party leader Shimon Peres to discuss the possibility of a national unity government. They were slated to meet Sunday.

Olmert goes to Istanbul

Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was expected to visit Turkey this week, though it was unclear if he would meet the Turkish president. The visit by Olmert, who is also Israel's trade minister, comes as relations between the two nations have soured in recent months.

Darfur crisis testing resolve of 'Never Again'

Rosensweig said one of Ve'ahavta's major donors, Walter Arbib, had arranged for $100,000 worth of pharmaceuticals, including multivitamins, antibiotics and hydration fluids, to be available to assist Darfur refugees. But the pharmaceuticals are in Holland and Ve'ahavta's campaign to raise $25,000 to transport the materials to Africa along with other relief goods, including tents, had been disappointing.

Rosensweig believes the community's tepid response is due to a number of factors.

"I think mostly when people respond, there's been a strong media push, and there hasn't been one on the Sudan yet. There's a general malaise regarding crisis response. There are too many of them.

"Also, the Sudan is so distant from us, they become 'the other,'" he said.

Rosensweig noted that some segments of the Jewish community are not interested in helping Muslims who are being killed by other Muslims. In that respect, Rosensweig said, the community is "somewhat polarized."

Ve'ahavta plans to co-ordinate its relief efforts with Shachar Zahavi, founder of IsraAID, an Israeli humanitarian organization. Zahavi has put together a team of between four and six Israelis ready to travel to refugee camps in Chad, a neighbour of Sudan, to administer the relief items.

Epstein said aid organizations are unable to help the refugees because government-backed militias have made travel to Darfur unsafe. Words of condemnation like those uttered by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell at refugee camps recently are inadequate, he said.

What is needed is a Security Council resolution under Chapter 7, which would authorize military intervention to secure humanitarian access, Epstein said.

The Canadian government, for its part, "could help draft a resolution to the Security Council and ask an ally on the Council to present it," he suggested.

"We want the Canadian government to push this and be a leader, as it was against apartheid."

Ve'ahavta has posted an online petition asking supporters to write to their MP or Foreign Minister Bill Graham, asking that Canada pressure Sudan to end the atrocities.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Manuel Prutschi said Congress had discussed the Sudan in meetings with Prime Minister Paul Martin and Graham. "Once the cabinet is formed, we will re-engage with further advocacy," he said.

In a March 15 letter to Epstein, Graham wrote, "Canada remains deeply concerned about the situation in Sudan, particularly the lack of respect for human rights and international humanitarian law."

The letter noted that Canada had opened an office in Khartoum to, in part, monitor the situation; it had provided financial and technical support for those monitoring ceasefires; it had expressed concerns to high levels of the Sudanese government; it had appointed Senator Mobina Jaffer to urge both sides of the conflict to build a durable peace; and it had given money to an organization mediating the Sudan Peace Process.

However, Epstein believes all of Canada's efforts amounted to talk, not the kind of action needed to avert an impending catastrophe.

Canada, like other UN member states, is afraid to label the atrocities in Sudan "genocide," as that would compel the UN to undertake a military intervention, he said.

In the United States, meanwhile, Nobel Peace Prize-winner Elie Wiesel, who for several years has been trying to place the Sudan violence on the public agenda, said Jews should focus on the Sudan.

"I do it as a Jew because I think Jews should be sensitive to other peoples as well," Wiesel said. "I cannot just live isolated."

Several American Jewish organizations have also spoken out on Sudan while the Jewish Disaster Relief Coalition, made up of some 45 Jewish groups across the political and religious spectrum, set up a mailbox for humanitarian relief for Sudanese refugees.

The coalition, through its mailbox at the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, had collected $11,000 US as of two weeks ago.

Catholic Church equates anti-Zionism with anti-Semitism

By SHLOMO SHAMIR

JERUSALEM — The Catholic Church condemned anti-Zionism as a cover for anti-Semitism in a joint statement issued by a forum of Catholic and Jewish intellectuals this week.

The announcement was made at a gathering of religious, academic and other leading Jewish and Catholic figures in Buenos Aires.

"We oppose anti-Semitism in any way and form, including anti-Zionism that has become of late a manifestation of anti-Semitism," the statement said.

This is the first time that anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism have been equated by the Catholic Church.

The statement also includes a stern condemnation of terrorism, particularly terror in the name of faith. "Terror is a sin against man and against God. Fundamentalist terrorism in the name of God has no justification and cannot be justified."

Ilan Steinberg, director of the World Jewish Congress, one of the forum's organizers, described the joint statement as "an historic moment."

"For the first time, the Catholic Church recognizes in anti-Zionism an attack not only against Jews, but against the whole Jewish people."

Senior Jewish figures called the announcement a significant, public statement of support by the Catholic Church in the face of anti-Zionism. "In the past, Zionism was equated with racism, and this statement turns anti-Zionism statements to a form of racism," a Jewish leader said in New York.

CLEVELAND — A fundraising campaign by the Cleveland Jewish community has helped four federation-affiliated day schools cut tuition by up to 45 per cent for the coming academic year.

As part of its multi-year, $137-million (all figures US) fundraising effort called the Centennial Initiative for Jewish Cleveland, the Jewish Community Federation of Cleveland announced in January that it would be creating a $20-million day school tuition endowment to help its four partner day schools defray tuition costs and hopefully raise enrolment, as the schools predicted it would.

All four – Gross Schechter Day School, the Agnon School, the Hebrew Academy of Cleveland and Fuchs Mizrachi School – have so far reported small increases in enrolment as a result of the new rollbacks, which at Gross Shechter and Agnon are also being funded with the help of large donors and voluntary contributions from parents who can afford it.

Tuition for the 2004-05 school year at Gross Schechter, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, will be $5,500 for students in kindergarten to Grade 8, rather than the previously expected $10,000 per student.

Agnon will be rolling back tuition from a range of $8,380 to $9,880 to between $5,500 to $6,500.

The Hebrew Academy of Cleveland (HAC), an Orthodox school, is using its share of the endowment to reduce next year's tuition by 15 per cent, said educational director Rabbi Simcha Dessler. Tuition last year was $6,660 to $9,465. HAC will also ask for a parental contribution toward "tuition containment."

Endowment money spurs enrolment gains

Fuchs Mizrachi School, a modern Orthodox and Zionist school, is decreasing tuition for grades 1 through 12 by $500 next year, while kindergarten will see a $1,000 reduction. Early-childhood's cost reduction will be $500 per half day. Last year, tuition ranged from $2,700 to $9,925.

At Gross Schechter, which last year had 277 students, "the rollback has been amazing for retention," said its headmaster, Rabbi Jim Rogozen. "Current parents signed up very quickly and in record numbers."

As for new students, enrolment is "creeping up a little," he said.

Agnon's head of school Jerry Isaak-Shapiro said the tuition rollback has not attracted that many prospective new students, but it has made families who were already interested in Agnon, which last year had an enrolment of 295, much more likely to apply.

HAC is already expecting increased enrolment from early childhood through high school, Rabbi Dessler said. Last year's enrolment was about 690 students.

"There's a tangible excitement in the air in anticipation of next year," he said.

Fuchs Mizrachi is anticipating slightly, but not dramatically, higher enrolment due to the tuition decrease, said communications and recruitment co-ordinator Diane Wilkoff.

"For an Orthodox day school, parents make a commitment, whether they can afford it or not. We've been getting a lot of inquiries from out of town. Some families don't even have jobs yet. They're just looking at Cleveland as a community."

So far, the school is budgeting for 338 students, a handful more than last year.

Canadian model could help solve Mideast conflict, professor says

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Canada's accommodation of Québécois nationalism and the rights of aboriginal peoples could serve as a model for Israel's recognition of its Arab minority, which in turn could help Palestinians be more open to acknowledging Israel's Jewish character, a Canadian professor told a conference here.

The goal is to encourage the Palestinians to negotiate in good faith, political science professor Charles Blattberg of the University of Montreal said in a talk at the recent 10th Biennial Jerusalem Conference in Canadian Studies, sponsored by the Israel Association for Canadian Studies.

"I would suggest that there has never been an attempt to change the Palestinian mind in such a way that they will be able to enter into good-faith negotiations," said Blattberg, whose discussion was titled "Terror, security and ethics."

Indeed, instead of negotiation, Blattberg advocates what he calls "conversation," which aims "for reconciliation through the integration of the values.

"Here, the point is not to accommodate one's adversaries, but rather to understand and really learn where they are coming from," he said.

"There hasn't been an attempt to genuinely convince the Palestinians that Israel as a Jewish state is a legitimate entity," Blattberg said. "That's why we need some degree of conversation, if only to bring about the kind of change that's necessary so that we can begin the genuine, good faith negotiations."

The key is giving Israel's Arab population the recognition it requires from the state, just as Québécois and aboriginal people have in Canada.

"First, I think we have to do a lot more to learn about Arab culture," he said, adding he is astounded by the fact that in Israel's public school system, Jews learn English as their second language and then choose between French and Arabic as a third option.

"There is a great deal of ignorance on the part of Zionists about Arab culture, and about Palestinian culture in particular," Blattberg said.

"Jewish Israelis need to recognize that Israel contains within it another nation – the Arab-Israeli nation – and that nation needs the recognition of the state."

Saying official bilingualism is not nearly enough to provide Arab Israelis with the recognition they require, Blattberg proposed other, more radical options.

"We need to change the Basic Law of Israel, from the declaration that it is a Jewish and democratic state, to declaring that it is a Jewish and Arab and democratic state," he said. "I also suggest that we add a pentagram to the Magen David on the Israeli flag as yet another way to grant the Arab nation the recognition that it deserves.

"What that will do is contribute to making the Arab-Israelis the patriots that we need in this country, both for a healthy, patriotic domestic politics and also to help us with the other project, namely reaching out to the Arabs outside of the country to do what we can to deal with that conflict."

Dozens of professors from universities across Canada and Israel gathered for the conference, held from June 28 to July 1 at the Halbert Center for Canadian Studies on Hebrew U's Mount Scopus campus. The more than 20 sessions on topics ranging from "Canadian universities facing crisis" to "Immigration, ethnic communities and insecurity in Canada" focused on the theme "Societies coping with crisis."

"How much freedom should we trade for our security?" Blattberg asked, opening his talk with a question he said has become pressing in Canada, in Israel and around the world.

"In Canada, we tend to conceive of the two values in question – freedom and security – as needing to be balanced," he said, noting this approach is integral to Canada's culture of negotiation, in which the objective is to find compromise between colliding values.

"There is a sort of zero-sum relation or dynamic between values – a little more weight to one value means less to the other and vice versa."

Dissatisfied with this typical Canadian approach to problem solving, Blattberg suggested an alternative that he calls "patriotic politics."

"I don't mean to invoke the notion of nationalism when I say 'patriotic,'" he said. "Rather [I am referring to] a more ancient approach to political philosophy, that of ancient classical republican thinkers who emphasize the idea of the common good.

"What's fundamental to patriotic politics is the idea that when values come in conflict, we shouldn't simply be looking to strike a balance between those values, but we should aim more ambitiously to try to reconcile those values, to truly integrate them without compromise," he said.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART I : IN PRAISE OF THE TAILOR'S DAUGHTER

Writers who dedicate their pens to preserving community history generally do so as a labour of love, knowing their literary efforts will probably not capture a huge reading audience nor generate huge royalty cheques.

Over the last decade, Miriam Bassin Chinsky has revisited her North Toronto childhood to write a series of popular articles for the North Toronto Town Crier. The paper recently published The Tailor's Daughter: Growing Up in North Toronto, a collection of Chinsky's fine literary sketches about the neighbourhood where she grew up.

For those of us who recall reading any of these pieces when they first appeared, The Tailor's Daughter reminds us of how delightful they were, and how worthy they are of being preserved between the covers of a book, like pressed flowers from long ago.

A freelance journalist who has also written many articles for The CJN, Chinsky was born in Toronto in 1925. She grew up along the stretch of Yonge Street between Eglinton Avenue and Sheldrake Boulevard, and often roamed eastward to Mt. Pleasant Road and westward to Avenue Road.

She writes with simple, sparkling elegance about this patch of urban territory as she knew it in the 1930s, '40s and '50s, when North Toronto was a distinct and somewhat remote neighbourhood linked to downtown by streetcar.

She writes poignantly about her father and mother in his tailor's shop on Yonge and in their home that was either above or within short walking distance of the shop. She also provides vivid word portraits of teachers, friends, neighbours, merchants, politicians and other local characters, such as 'Enry, a former sailor and itinerant labourer:

"A wisp of a man, bent almost double, he was one of that legion who gravitated to Toronto from the failing Prairie farms, from the impoverished East Coast towns and villages, from all across the country, and walked the city's streets in the depressed '30s, looking for work or a handout. 'Enry didn't take handouts."

Local history buffs will treasure Chinsky's recollections of neighbourhood shops, department stores, schools, movie theatres and institutions such as the Preventorium. An "attractive white building with lofty colonial columns," the Preventorium was a 128-bed facility for sick and convalescent children that once stood on Sheldrake near Yonge.

The book is a pleasing memory album of a neighbourhood at a time when movie theatres lured patrons by offering one fancy china plate at a low price with each ticket sold, and when teachers thought nothing of smacking their pupils, the iceman made regular rounds, and theatres (like the Eglinton, built 1936) were opulent palaces.

The pieces I like best are those that record some personal incident and carry an unseen twist and an important lesson about life. "To Fix A Tuxedo" and "End of Naivety" are two examples. Each builds to a simple emotional climax involving the sharp perception of a previously undetected social or racial barrier.

"A Lytton Glade" recalls a garden party in an exclusive neighbourhood mansion that features an exotic sunken garden on its grounds. A magical place to a child, the private garden was later ceded to the city as a tiny gem of a park. Chinsky recalls the garden party and a return visit to the site five or six decades later.

Chinsky describes the heat wave of 1936 and the polio scare of 1937, but seems to reach much farther back into history at times. She recalls seeing the Eglinton Hunt Club in all of its finery, "straight out of an English hunting print," and, even more incredibly, provides a glimpse of Thomas Mower Martin, an old-time resident and artist who was born in 1838.

Publication of The Tailor's Daughter was assisted by numerous local sponsors who want to give it as wide a distribution as possible. The book deserves a wide readership. If you can't find it at your local bookshop, visit the website www.multimedianova.com or contact the Town Crier at 416-785-4300, ext. 282.

Literary Notes

• Charles Gross has written The Giant of Schwartz Shtima, a redolent family history and memoir of his parents and grandparents who came from Ukraine to the Canadian prairies and ultimately settled in Winnipeg's north end. The family name of Kassoy was later altered to Kassie and Casey. The memoir is so infused with Yiddish that it offers a glossary of phrases at the back. For information, contact Geraldine Gross Roy, 1976 Amble Greene Dr., White Rock, B.C., V4A 7K5.

• Hungry I Books of Montreal has published The Little Underworld of Edison Wiese, a story by Cary Fagan. The book was edited by Norman Ravvin and printed in a limited edition of 500 copies, and is offered as the first title in a new series devoted to Canadian Jewish writing.

• Second Story Press has published Great Women Leaders, a book for young people by Heather Ball as part of its Women's Hall of Fame series. The multicultural assortment of 10 subjects runs the gamut from Hatshepsut, an ancient Egyptian, to Golda Meir, the legendary Israeli prime minister. Rosa Parks, Aung San Suu Kyi and Wangari Maathai are also featured.

BAHA'I GARDENS WINS AWARD

Haifa's world-famous Baha'i Gardens, a breathtaking series of horticultural terraces and hanging gardens that extends a kilometre down Mount Carmel, was honoured in Toronto last week with a 2003 Phoenix Award from the Society of American Travel Writers.

Presenting the award to Baha'i representatives at the Windsor Arms Hotel, SATW executive John Macdonald recalled visiting the Baha'i Gardens shortly before its official opening in May 2001. "It blew my mind away," he said. "Instead of an hour, we spent nearly a whole day there."

Inaugurated in 1969, the Phoenix Award is presented annually in recognition of conservation, preservation, beautification and anti-pollution campaigns that further the growth and appeal of travel regions.

The Baha'i Gardens "qualifies for the Phoenix as beautification," Macdonald said. "I've never seen anything like it, and I've seen lots of gardens around the world."

The gardens were built to adorn the golden-domed Shrine of the Bab, the second most holy spot of the Baha'i faith. An oasis of tranquillity in the heart of a bustling port city, the gardens provide a contemplative space in which ordered flowerbeds, water fountains and expansive lawns give way to natural perimeters of trees and shrubs. The cost of US $260 million was raised entirely through private donations.

"They took a mountain of rock and scrub brush– that's all it was, rock and scrub brush – and they turned it into a magnificent jewel," Macdonald said. "This is going to be one of Israel's top attractions, if it's not already."

On hand to accept the award was project director and architect Fariborz Sahba, who spent 15 years working on the project; he currently lives in the Toronto area. Sahba thanked three Haifa mayors, several Israeli prime ministers and the city's residents for their support and patience during the lengthy construction period.

Sahba said he often heard stories about Mount Carmel when he was growing up in the Baha'i faith in his native Iran. "When I was a child my mother would show me a pebble and say, 'This has come from Mount Carmel,'" he said. "For me, it was such an honour to work on that mountain. For the Baha'is, it's one of the most holy places on earth."

(Coincidentally, two other Canadian architects also helped shape the Baha'i World Centre: Montreal-born William Sutherland Maxwell (1874-1952) designed the Shrine of the Bab and Iranian-born Hossein Amanat, a Vancouverite since 1980, designed the award-winning administrative buildings.)

Gerald Filson of the Baha'i Community of Canada, representatives of the Israel Government Tourist Office of Toronto and numerous travel writers were also present at the ceremony.

New Museum for Jerusalem: The Menachem Begin Heritage Center, an interactive museum and educational facility highlighting the legacy of the former Israeli prime minister, opened in Jerusalem in June across from the Old City Walls below Yemin Moshe.

Designed to be similar to an American presidential library, it houses important papers, artifacts and exhibits related to Begin, who was prime minister from 1977 to 1982. Although he stood on the right of Israel's political spectrum, Begin is best remembered as co-architect of the 1978 Camp David accords, for which he won a Nobel Peace Prize. The treaty ended decades of hostility between Israel and Egypt.

The Menachem Begin Center "provides visitors with insights into one of Israel's most important leaders and offers glimpses of what life was like during his lifetime," said Rami Levi, Israel Tourism Ambassador for North and South America. York grad turns high school project into full-length musical

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It's not often someone turns a high school project into a full-stage production, but Brian Goldenberg has done just that.

Seven of Us is the culmination of a project Goldenberg, 24, began in high school five years ago.

"Seven of Us is an original musical that I wrote," he said. "It's about seven students who have just graduated from university and are unsure about where they want to go and the choices they have to make."

The musical premiers July 15 at the Markham Youth Theatre and runs until July 17.

The musical revolves around one of the characters, Rob, whose father wants him to go into the family business, but his girlfriend wants them to travel to Europe instead. "It's the struggle between the three of them," he said. "It's a relationship story with a few twists."

Goldenberg is a graduate of Unionville High School's specialized arts program and York University's music department.

His high school choir would finish each school year by performing a medley of tunes from musicals. In his graduating year, he thought it would be a good idea to do some original music, "so I created a sketch of a story, wrote eight songs, put them into a medley and orchestrated the choir," he said.

He had always vowed to finish the project, but held off during his years at university. He resurrected the idea last summer and held a workshop at the Vaughan Musical Playhouse.

"That was the first draft of it. I did some work on it based on audience feedback and suggestions and the story has since evolved quite a bit."

For instance, originally the musical was about students finishing high school. "It would make a lot more sense if they were finishing university, so I fast forwarded the characters five years into the future – the characters are much more developed now."

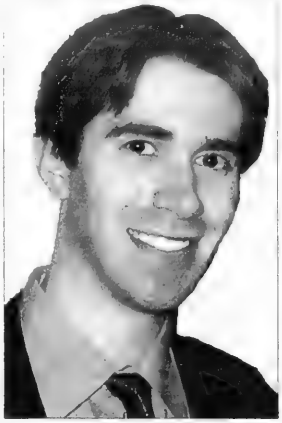
Proceeds from the musical will go to the Herbert H. Carnegie Future Aces Foundation, an organization that focuses on making a difference in the lives of young people.

Carnegie, an African Canadian, was considered one of this nation's rising hockey stars but was forbidden to play in the NHL in the 1950s due to his colour. He formed the foundation to help children overcome obstacles and to promote diversity.

Goldenberg received a scholarship from the foundation after high school and has remained involved with the organization ever since, writing its musical theme song.

"The foundation has helped me become who I've become," he said.

Goldenberg has been involved in various capacities with the Markham Youth Theatre for five years. The non-profit theatre is run for youth by youth.



Brian Goldenberg

"Everybody involved – the crew, the pit, the actors and directors – are all between 14 and 25," he said. "It's kids doing stuff for kids."

Goldenberg has been playing music since the age of six. He has produced or been musical director for eight other musicals, and he also plays in a band, manages a brass quintet and orchestrates an inner-city choir group. His song Music Will Always Lead Me Home won first prize in an In Front magazine music contest.

"I'm not your typical music theatre freak," says. "I'm first and foremost a musician. I play piano, trumpet and sing. I love musicals, but I wouldn't say I'm not interested in other forms of art. I'm equally satisfied watching a ballet as much as a musical."

He says the music for Seven of Us is modern pop, influenced by Chicago (the band not the musical).

Goldenberg will soon be too old for the Markham Youth Theatre. He plans to go to graduate school and continue writing music (he's written more than 100 pop songs) and producing theatre. He also wants to teach.

For tickets to Seven of Us, call the Markham Youth Theatre box office at 905-305-7469. For more information on the Herbert H. Carnegie Future Aces Foundation, visit www.futureaces.org.

New translation of an 'extremely difficult' book

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"Futility of futilities! All is futile!" I heard someone mutter recently while glancing up with darkened brow from the pages of Kohelet, the biblical book also known as Ecclesiastes.

The utterance was understandable, since most commentators, if they agree on anything at all about Kohelet, seem to be in accordance that it is a most vexing and perplexing scroll.

Even though Kohelet, the narrator from whom the book gets its name, warns that "the making of many books is without limit and much study is a wearying of the flesh," I decided to explicitly ignore that caveat in order to present a brief discussion of the Jewish Publication Society's (JPS) recently published new translation of Ecclesiastes/Kohelet, with extensive commentary by biblical scholar Michael V. Fox.

Possessing a myriad of philosophical contradictions and inconsistencies, Kohelet also has such a convoluted structure that one 19th-century pseudo-scholar seriously proposed that it was written on a set of index cards that were accidentally shuffled into permanent misarrangement. (The most satisfying interpretation I've heard is that the book presents a debate between four archetypes – builder, hedonist, wise man and man who fears God – the precise quartet of qualities that best defines King Solomon, its purported author.)

A knotty book, Kohelet is also a naughty book that seems at times to plunge headlong into heresy, as when the narrator advocates an "eat, drink and be merry" lifestyle because only dust and nothingness await beyond the grave. This is a flagrant denial of the Jewish belief in the World to Come and man's accountability before God.

Kohelet generally repudiates such controversial opinions with statements more in harmony with Jewish values. But it's no surprise that the book was the focus of intense discussion among the early rabbis over its inclusion in the Jewish canon.

It was canonized for at least two major reasons. First, the book has a strong association with King Solomon, its ostensible narrator, to whom authorship is traditionally ascribed. Second and more significantly, its conclusion (12:13) – "The sum of the matter, when all is said and done: Revere God and observe His commandments" – strongly reaffirms the Jewish belief system.

Classified as wisdom literature, Kohelet is a philosophic treatise that explores how best to live one's life, as well as the problems of good and evil, and reward and punishment. Although its language can be frustratingly obscure in places, its shining poetry has immeasurably enriched our language.

"To everything there is a season" is perhaps its most famous set piece, but it possesses many other familiar passages and phrases. Kohelet tells us that there is nothing new under the sun, that a three-fold cord is not quickly broken, that the race is not to the swift nor the battle to the valiant. It is also Kohelet that advises us to cast our bread upon the waters and that a fly will sometimes get into the ointment.

In an impressive 20-page introduction to the new JPS translation, Fox discusses the issues mentioned above and many others – including the dating of the text. Despite the traditional linkage to Solomon in the late 10th century BCE, he asserts that it is "clearly postexilic." He summarizes the scientific evidence, linguistic and otherwise, to suggest it was likely written in the third century BCE.

Fox warns that the book "is in places extremely difficult" with an idiosyncratic vocabulary, strange syntax and many unclear sentences that resist imposed meanings. He defends Kohelet's unity but like most commentators, ends up explaining away many of its philosophical diversions on a piecemeal basis.

Particularly useful are his summaries of numerous major interpretations from classical Midrash, Ibn Ezra, Rashbam and other sources. A "watershed" in understanding the book came in the mid-19th-century, he writes, when biblical scholars no longer felt compelled to see the work through the straitjacket of traditional biblical exegesis, and recognized in it "a darker, less pious countenance."

King Solomon enters Jerusalem in the medieval Spanish illustration. According to tradition, Solomon wrote the Song of Songs as a young man, Proverbs in his middle years, and Ecclesiastes or Kohelet as an old man.

Fox's insightful commentary is not without its deficiencies. For example, when Kohelet the God-fearer famously refers to "Gavoah me-al Gavoah...," the One higher than the high who watches and the higher ones above them (5:7), he sees in this only an elaborate human bureaucracy without reference to either God or the angels.

This is a surprising lapse from one who so readily acknowledges Kohelet's ultimate faith in God and His commandments. "For Kohelet, these are bedrock truths that experience can collide with but not dislodge," he observes.

Likewise, the inventive translation seems idiosyncratic in a few spots. The repeated phrase "Ureut ruach," for instance, which is often taken as "a vexation of spirit," is here reduced to "a vexation of wind." Yes, both meanings are correct, but the first signifies a disturbance that gets deeply under the skin and so probably comes closer to the intended meaning.

JPS should be commended for its sensitive textual arrangement, which sets off sections of poetic and metrical language into stanzas. Only the obviously poetic "Everything has its season" passage (3:1-8) receives similar treatment in the Art Scroll Ecclesiastes, where everything else is presented as a continuous prose block.

The JPS volume should have featured more about Kohelet's regal alter-ego. King Solomon was famed for his wisdom, built the Temple, took 1,000 wives and amassed huge wealth. Our multifaceted narrator, even if we don't accept that he is Solomon, obviously had much in common with him. However, Fox seems to dismiss the Solomonic connection without a serious discussion of the life and accomplishments of Israel's legendary king. He also pays scant attention to the important subthemes related to the kingdom, inheritance and the father-son relationship.

Both the JPS and the Art Scroll editions of Kohelet have their strengths and their weaknesses. Art Scroll's commentary is more diligent about citing scriptural, talmudic and rabbinical references, but often does so in such an abbreviated form as to appear breezily simplistic. The sum of the matter, when all is said and done, is that the JPS Ecclesiastes/ Kohelet is a thorough, sensitive and engaging study with much to recommend it.

Chief JVS psychologist retiring after 40 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In the 40 years she has worked at Jewish Vocational Service of Greater Toronto, Ruth Borchiver, chief psychologist and director of education, has seen a sea change in day school education.

Shortly after she started as a career and rehabilitation counsellor in 1964, JVS was given funds by the predecessor of UJA Federation to provide educational services to one Jewish day school, with Borchiver as the consultant.

Currently, JVS serves about 6,000 students in 12 schools on 21 campuses. Schools now participate in the funding and work in partnership with UJA Federation, says Borchiver.

When she started at JVS, some day school students were tested privately, but for the most part, students who were struggling continued to struggle, says Borchiver, who is retiring in August.

She began working at a time when many women remained at home, she says. "I had a degree, however, and I wanted to do something satisfactory.

"My family was steeped in the Jewish community, and I felt that there was a whole side of myself I could use here. I was proud to be able to use my skills to benefit the community at large.

"[When I was looking for a job] there were few candidates in my field, so I had several offers with good salaries, but somehow the offers didn't work for me. Then I heard of a place called JVS. To be kind, it was in an extremely modest building, in poor repair. The wages and offices were just as modest. After a brief interview, I took the job."

Ruth Borchiver

Borchiver became a registered psychologist in 1965 and went on to earn a doctorate in applied psychology in 1991.

"I went back to school for the thrill of learning. I was anxious to study new theories, which are the underpinnings of everything we do. I got a big bang out of that."

She remained at the agency while she went to school, and "everyone there was very supportive. Adult education is a marvelous thing."

Before day school students had the benefit of psychological testing, Borchiver says, those who were not doing well in one or two subjects often felt inept. "They did not realize that they had certain strengths, and they would begin to question their ability to go on. Now, students who might have left in the past stay in the day school system."

In order to succeed, she says, students need the support of parents and teachers, and assistance, if needed.

"It is also necessary to screen students while they are young. That is when their brains are flexible."

The agency works as a team with Jewish Family & Child Service in order to get input from professionals, she says.

Borchiver still "gets a thrill" from student success stories. "One student had supportive parents, but was faltering in day school. I thought that [the Dr. Abraham Shore] She'arim Hebrew Day School [Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre] might be the place for him, and he thrived there.

"Some years later, I met him at CHAT and he thanked me for guiding him."

Another child who was part of a dysfunctional family was having emotional problems in preschool, she says. "The odds were against her, but she also went on to succeed at CHAT. With her mother's support, her own strength and the help of the school, she made out well."

Borchiver says she is moved by these stories, "because these are children who might not have gotten it together."

She is retiring, she says, but she is not hanging up her shingle. "I plan on doing a limited amount of private counselling, because I find a lot of purpose in my work."

She also plans to visit Israel and spend more time with her family.

A gala dinner to honour Borchiver is planned for Sept. 28 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Amaro boasts baseball pedigree, Jewish family values

By JOSHUA CASPER
Special to The CJN

MERRICK, N.Y. — He was a star shortstop for the Philadelphia Phillies and the son of Cuban baseball icon Santos Amaro. She is the daughter of Russian-Jewish immigrant Dorothy Herman and lived in a predominantly Jewish neighourhood of Philadelphia. Yet Ruben Amaro Sr. and Judy Herman had much in common – foremost their love for each other.

As their son Ruben Jr. follows in his father's and grandfather's footsteps in baseball, he bears his mother's Jewish identity, adding to a long legacy of Jewish baseball players.

The Amaros were a tight-knit family that celebrated all of the Jewish holidays. Ruben Jr., 39, now assistant general manager of the Phillies, recalls many family Passover seders and Chanukah celebrations. While the Amaros were not particularly observant, Ruben Jr.'s Judaism remains an important part of his identity.

Baseball, of course, is also central to his life, and Ruben Jr. can boast a distinguished baseball pedigree. His grandfather, Santos (Kangaroo) Amaro, is a baseball legend who was never able to play in the major leagues because of the colour barrier. He is enshrined in both the Cuban and Mexican halls of fame.

The year was 1960. Ruben Amaro was playing in Philadelphia, where he would spend most of his career. A fan favourite, he also fit in well in the clubhouse. He developed a kinship with the Phillies' contingent of Latino players – Tony Taylor, Pancho Herrera and Tony Gonzalez.

At that time, the Latino players took English lessons at the Herman home with Judy's sister, and Amaro would drive them to their classes. There, he met 18-year-old Judy. It was love at first sight.

"I think it's kind of a replica of things that happened in my family," says Ruben Sr., who married Judy in 1961. "My dad was very dark; my mom was white; everybody in the family is very white. I wanted to marry someone that resembled my mom. I stayed in the United States and started to socialize with her. I got to know her family. We fell in love."

Despite their differences, it was a seamless match. Judy's family took an immediate liking to Ruben, and their differences were never an issue.

Ruben and Judy were married in a Jewish ceremony, and within a year, Judy gave birth to their first child, David. Ruben Jr. was born four years later. Ruben Sr. spent a lot of time on the road so, like other women married to professional athletes, Judy had the main responsibility for the children.

"I had a good partner, which made for a good situation," Ruben Sr. says. "My wife was helpful to my baseball career and with the kids. She had a really tough time, always left alone with the two kids. She did a magnificent job with both David and Ruben. She was both father and mother for a long time."

Ruben Amaro Jr.

If Amaro gets his baseball pedigree from his father, his mother helped to instil Amaro's sense of family and strong moral fibre. He equates those values with his Jewish identity.

"Being Jewish is certainly a part of me," said Ruben Jr. "The one thing about Judaism that stands out for me is respect for your family – that your immediate family was always first, however large or small your family is. That was always foremost in my mind. There was always a family closeness associated with Judaism."

Despite coming from different cultures, Ruben Sr. and his wife shared similar values. None was more paramount than a commitment to education, and it was something they passed along to their children. Both David and Ruben Jr. starred in the classroom and on the ball field at the prestigious Penn Charter High School.

"Ruben and I graduated from good colleges," says David "I think a real dedication to academics was strong. I remember that being part [of] the Jewish side of me. It shaped my character."

'Ultimately, I'm looking to move up as a GM'

While David's baseball career was winding down in the late 1980s, Ruben Jr.'s had begun to take off. He led Stanford to a record 53 wins and the NCAA title. He was drafted by the California Angels in the 11th round and made his major league debut in 1990. The following offseason, he was shipped to the Phillies in exchange for Von Hayes.

"I played almost my entire career there," says Amaro Sr. "Judy is a native Philadelphian and [Ruben Jr.] grew up there. I was very happy for him – he was coming home after being a batboy for our ball club. Things really worked out very well."

Ruben Jr., who played most of his career in the outfield, got a chance to play every day for the Phillies in 1992. But he struggled, hitting just .219 in 374 at-bats. The next year, he spent most of the season in the minor leagues, and then he was traded to the Cleveland Indians. In 1996, he returned to Philadelphia, where he would spend three seasons as a reserve. Sensing his career coming to an end, Amaro began to think about the future.

"I was very fortunate," says Ruben Jr. "I wanted to stay in baseball. I wasn't sure, ultimately, if that was on the field, as a scout or in the front office. In 1998, during spring training, I went to [general manager] Ed Wade's office and expressed my interest in staying with the Phillies. In that conversation, the idea of being his assistant was brought up."

After the season, Ruben decided to hang up his spikes and move upstairs to the Phillies front office as their assistant GM, learning the nuances of baseball operations under Wade's tutelage.

"I had spoken with Ruben about the possibility of doing something after he retired," recalls Wade. "At that stage of his career, he had to decide what he was going to do sooner rather than later. He had all of the elements necessary for the job. We knew he was going to be a huge asset."

In his sixth season as the Phillies' assistant GM, Amaro has been a key factor in the team's turnaround and is now regarded as one of the top young executives in baseball. Amaro was among the finalists to replace Dan Evans as the Los Angeles Dodgers GM, but the job went to Dodgers assistant GM, Paul DePodesta.

"Ultimately, I'm looking to move up as a GM and run my own organization and my own club. It was a great experience to have been interviewed," says Ruben Jr. "I feel like I'll be able to build an organization. If that's in the cards, great, but I'm grateful to be in Philly."

Israeli Olympians offered gold medal bonus

By YOAV BOROVICH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Ronit Tirosh, director general of Israel's Ministry of Education, pledged last week to pay 250,000 Shekels ($74,000 Cdn) to any Israeli athlete who brings home a gold medal from this summer's Olympic Games in Athens.

The reward matched the bonus offered by the Israel Olympic Committee (IOC), lifting the prize for gold to 500,000 shekels ($148,000 Cdn).

Speaking before the Israel Olympic team gathered in Caesarea for a day of photo-ops, interviews and speeches, Tirosh said she would also take steps to help athletes who wished to pursue higher education after retiring from sports.

IOC chairman Zvi Varshaviak said the squad could win two or three medals, with nine or 10 athletes having the potential to reach the finals in their respective events.

Tennis players Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich, who will compete in the men's doubles, and Anna Smashnova Pistolesi, who will compete in the women's singles, recently joined the Olympic team.

"The Olympics may not be the biggest tournament in tennis, but all the same I am very excited to represent Israel," said Smashnova-Pistolesi.

"Now that we have reached our aim of making Athens, we will make every effort to come back with a medal," said Ram.

European champion judoka Arik Ze'evi, who was picked to carry the flag at the opening ceremonies, said he was not daunted by expectations for him to win Israel's first-ever Olympic gold.

"I am aware of the expectations on me, but they don't scare me. On the contrary, they only serve to spur me on," Ze'evi said.

The Olympic squad met with President Moshe Katsav in Jerusalem and later the same day they attended a memorial ceremony for the 11 Israeli athletes murdered by Palestinian terrorists at the 1972 Munich Olympics.

I'm not a girl and not yet a woman

I remember when I first turned 20, I had to keep repeating my new age to myself over and over again, just to convince myself it was true. Twenty seemed so old to me, so mature, and yet I felt I had such a long way to go to adulthood.

Not much has changed in the past three years, except that now I'm much more comfortable with looking forward to becoming the kind of adult I want to be, and much better at pretending I already am the mature young woman other people expect me to be.

BY SANDIE BENITAH

The adult I want to become… mature as people expect me to be… but it's as if I'm living out a play called Sandra Dee Goes To Adulthood. The feeling is nothing new. It's odd, but despite my successes, my smarts and my social life, I feel like an adult only when I'm doing something I know my older sisters did when they were my age.

Recently, one of Toronto's newspapers made a decision to feature more strong female images. Twenty-somethings like myself constantly vow to live up to a strong female image, at all costs.

It seems I'm always trying to define myself by the hobbies I choose, the boys I date, the shows I watch and the topics I study. More than that, I am defining myself to fit into a role I have already created in my mind. My life has become a play of a play I've studied and shaped for years, and now it's as if I'm simply mastering the lead role. The question is, when does adulthood start to be for real?

When I ventured into the workplace for a job interview, I put on my best grown-up face and my best-looking, grown-up business suit to convince the world I was an asset to be reckoned with. Once I got hired, I was as enthusiastic and hardworking as they come, only to be recognized on my yearly review as the "cute junior employee who was a pleasure to work with and always willing to learn."

It was a slap in the face, as I'm pretty sure my teacher Mora Levy wrote the exact same comment on my Grade 1 report card. Maybe I'm being paranoid, but just how old do I have to be and how hard do I have to work before my boss starts commenting on my skills, rather than my cute enthusiasm?

I felt as if I was six years old, wobbling through life in my mom's high heels all over again. Maybe Britney Spears has it right: I'm not a girl, not yet a woman. Instead of laughing at Spears, perhaps it's time I face the music and start singing along.

Not giving up on my quest to master maturity, I recently planned to head to Israel for the first time, with a group of strangers, in an attempt to get closer to my ideal self-image of the strong, independent female. But then irony struck and I was diagnosed with an unmistakable childhood disease – whooping cough.

Feverish, weak, and with a deep, hacking cough, I literally became a baby all over again, relishing each moment of my parents' unfaltering attention. "My baby, you're so sick," my mom whispered over and over again, her hands constantly on my face, feeling for my temperature and trying to caress my pain away. Although I've never felt so small, I've also never felt so great.

One step forward, two steps back seems to be the dance craze of my generation. It's tough being at an age at which you are expected to act and feel like an adult, when really, you're still tackling childhood insecurities. Toughest of all is realizing that most of these expectations of adulthood come from within.

When I was young and watched my sisters loving their lives, I had high hopes for what I would do when I reached their age. Now that I've reached that pivotal point, I realize they probably weren't loving their lives as much as they were living them.

Living life, I guess, is just what being an adult in your 20s is all about.

GRILLED PORTOBELLOS

12 small to medium Portobello Mushroom Caps
Vinaigrette
1/4 cup balsamic vinegar
1/4 cup french dijon mustard
3/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
2 garlic cloves, minced fine or pressed
1/4 cup freshly snipped mixed herbs (rosemary, basil, thyme, oregano, etc.)
salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
squirt of fresh lime juice

1. Prepare vinaigrette in large glass bowl
2. Clean outside of mushroom caps with damp paper towel. Remove stems, scrape dark brown gills from inside of caps. Dip into vinaigrette and place into a plastic zipper bag. Marinate 1 hour, turning bag occasionally.
3. Preheat grill to medium; place mushrooms on grill, turning frequently and basting for 5-10 minutes until done.

Presentation: Present cap side up on a large platter lined with leafy greens for a buffet. The caps may be turned over and filled with rice or an orzo salad.
Serves: 6-12, depending upon size of mushrooms and rest of menu.
Garnish: Fresh herbs of your choice

About Life

Dear Ella,

My son is one of the statistics you hear about on the news. He is nine years old and 20 pounds overweight. It affects his ability to play sports with his friends. He can't run bases well and they make fun of him. It breaks my heart.

He doesn't feel good about himself and I am trying to fix that. I don't really want him to go to a diet club, so with the help of his doctor, I have devised a healthy program for him to follow. I work hard to organize and prepare meals, but then his grandmother comes along with sweets and treats. When dining out, she often asks him what he would like for dessert. She even offers him her leftovers. Although I've explained our goals to her many times, she argues that he needs to eat, since he is a growing boy. Am I fighting a losing battle?

Food Pusher

Dear Food Pusher

You are right that child obesity is a problem. A number of risk factors are associated with increased levels of obesity in youth. With that knowledge, I commend you on being proactive in trying to nip this problem in the bud.

Grandma loves her grandson dearly, and feeding him is one way she shows it. For the time being, try to stay out of restaurants. Celebrate special occasions at home, where you control the meals. That old adage, "You can't teach an old dog new tricks" runs deeper than you might think, so a different strategy may be in order.

Your son is nine, and although I'm sure he loves treats from his grandmother, I think that at his age he can be taught to understand they are not permitted. Have a standby treat for him so that he does not feel deprived, something that is not food-related, such as a small toy or craft.

Let him know how proud you are of him every time he makes a good decision. Enlist the help of other family members, his teacher, literature – anything you can to help him see you are all on the same page. Make this a positive experience and show him he is making progress. Eventually, grandma will jump on the bandwagon, too.

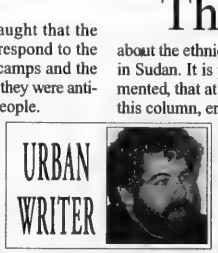
The Holocaust – in Sudan

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

For years, we have been taught that the world's citizens were slow to respond to the realities of the concentration camps and the barbarism of the Nazis, because they were anti-Semitic and hated the Jewish people.



But, sadly, I believe, that this is only the partial truth. If you want to know where the rest of the world was during the Holocaust, check your scheduler today. People were car-pooling their children, watching movies and running their businesses, just as we are in July 2004 during the genocide in Sudan.

People were busy. They had their own problems, just as we do today while babies are torn away from their mothers in Darfur as part of the genocide in Sudan. Regular folk went about their business, unless forced to become involved, and the Holocaust was allowed to unfold. Generally, we are not anti-Sudanese. We're just too busy.

We will never be able to say we didn't know about the ethnic cleansing, torture and slavery in Sudan. It is painfully clear, and well documented, that at this very moment, as you read this column, entire villages are being levelled as part of the genocide in Sudan. This is an indisputable fact.

But most of us will read this, then put down The CJN and go about our business as though Sudan does not exist. We might justify our indifference by saying we can't change the realities of war – indeed, this is what most of the world's citizens lazily stated during the Holocaust.

First and foremost, I am disappointed in myself as a Jew. As Sudan played out, I was too busy with budgets and forecasts. I allowed Sudan to happen until a couple of Jewish community members who couldn't live with the hypocrisy of "Never again" reminded me of my responsibilities.

I now share this with you. We still have a chance. I call upon community leaders and all those who are able to respond to the great tragedy in Sudan. This is what we expected from the world during the Holocaust.

Here is what you can do.

• Put notes in your scheduler that read, "Fight the genocide in Sudan." Force yourself to find time to fight for the lives of the two million Sudanese who could die very soon.

• Learn about the genocide. Type "Sudan" into your favourite search engine. The more you know, the more able you are to respond. The graphic information is all painfully there.

• Become involved in C.A.S.T.S – Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan, a committee administered by Norman Epstein. Its website address is http://www.geocities.com/castsudan/.

• Play a role in Ve'ahavta's response to the genocide. Visit www.veahavta.org to find out about its plan of action.

• Involve your children, family and colleagues in this struggle. Call or write your MP and the United Nations.

• Launch a "Never Again"committee at your shul and/or company and co-ordinate a vigil and other active responses. In New York, the Reform movement marched in front of the Sudanese embassy calling for a halt to the genocide. Do the same in Canada.

After the genocide in Rwanda, the Jewish community in Toronto shared its post-Holocaust experiences of healing with Rwandan survivors. This was a genuine expression of caring, but it was, ultimately, too little and too late. We cannot do the same with Sudan.

The time to respond is now. We have the ability to do so, and the moral responsibility to act. Let us finally stop bemoaning the indifference of the world, as though the world is not us, and instead soar courageously into the dominion of deeds and action.

"Never Again" is upon us, today. It is called Sudan!

Human chain of protest

An estimated 130,000 Israelis formed a human chain on the weekend from Nitzanim in the Gaza Strip to Jerusalem to protest Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan. Inset are Yaakov Feldman, left, and David Weinberg, formerly of Toronto, and two of Weinberg's children Dovi and Mordechai, who took part in the protest. Please see related story on page 25. [Israel photo]

Canada abstains on UN security fence vote

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dan Gillerman
Israel's UN ambassador

To the chagrin of the Canada-Israel Committee, Canada has once again opted for neutrality in a United Nations' General Assembly debate on Israeli policy.

On July 20, Canada joined nine other countries in abstaining on a resolution demanding Israel's compliance with a non-binding International Court of Justice (ICJ) ruling against the Jewish state's controversial separation barrier. The ICJ's July 9 decision called on Israel to dismantle sections of the fence, which snakes through the West Bank and around eastern Jerusalem.

One hundred and fifty countries, including all 25 from the European Union, voted for the Palestinian resolution, while six nations opposed it: Israel, the United States, Australia, Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Pacific island of Palau.

Apart from Canada, the abstainers were Uruguay, Cameroon, Tonga, Vanuatu, El Salvador, Uganda, Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands and Nauru.

Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee, voiced disappointment with Ottawa's abstention, but noted that Canada had not gone the way of the EU.

"It's a significant development that Canada broke with the European Union," Fogel said in an interview from Ottawa."But Canada's position falls far short of where Canada should be. That's problematic, and we have to work on it."

The Hague-based ICJ is an inappropriate forum for debating what is a political rather than a legal issue, he said. "It has been dragged into a political debate and hijacked for partisan political gain. Canada should oppose that."

Jewish members stay in cabinet

By JANICE ARNOLD

MONTREAL — Irwin Cotler said he is confident his national action plan against hate and racism will not be delayed because of the minority Liberal government.

The Mount Royal MP, who was reappointed justice minister and attorney general, believes there is support among the other parties for the plan, whose cornerstone is codifying the various anti-hate provisions that now exist to protect minorities.

New Envoy Named

JERUSALEM — Alan Baker will be Israel's next ambassador to Canada. A legal adviser to the Foreign Affairs Ministry in Jerusalem, Baker led Israel's response to the International Court of Justice hearings on the West Bank security barrier. North American Jewish leaders were told of his appointment July 9 in a conference call with Baker about the ICJ's fence ruling. He is slated to start his new job in September, replacing Haim Divon, the ambassador since September 2000.

Fund for Sderot Youth

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has set up a fund to give 500 Israeli kids from Sderot, the target of frequent Palestinian rocket attacks, the chance to go to overnight camp near Be'er Sheva. The Afik Memorial Fund is named for Afik Ohayon-Zehavi, a three-year-old boy killed June 28 by a rocket fired from Gaza that also seriously injured his mother. False Victim Says Sorry

PARIS — A French woman who falsely claimed to be the victim of an anti-Semitic attack apologized on national TV. Reading from a prepared statement July 17, Marie-Leonie Leblanc, 23, said she was "deeply sorry… and I ask forgiveness from all those I tricked and hurt." On July 9, Leblanc alleged six men, thinking she was Jewish, attacked her on a train near Paris and drew swastikas on her stomach and overturned her baby carriage. She later admitted there was no attack and that she drew the swastikas herself. She is charged with reporting an imaginary crime and faces six months in jail and a fine.

France Livid After Sharon Urges Jews to Leave

PARIS — A diplomatic crisis erupted between France and Israel over Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's call last week for French Jews to immigrate to Israel because of "the wildest anti-Semitism" in France.

Outraged, President Jacques Chirac responded by having his office inform Jerusalem that Sharon would not be welcome in Paris. However, the message was mainly a show of displeasure, since no visit is planned.

In a speech to Jewish leaders in Jerusalem, Sharon acknowledged France was trying to stem anti-Semitism, but he said the threat was so grave, French Jews should head for Israel without delay. "If I have to advise our brothers in France, I'll tell them one thing – move to Israel, as early as possible. I say that to Jews all around the world, but [in France], I think it's a must and they have to move immediately," he said.

The French embassy in Israel protested to Sharon's office, and the charge d'affaires of Israel's embassy in Paris was summoned to meet Chirac's political advisor, who said Chirac is furious and wants an explanation. Israel has yet to give one.

Survivors Compensated

NEW YORK — Germany has agreed to compensate Jews forced to work in Bulgarian labour camps in World War II. Documentation newly unearthed by the Claims Conference about the Nazi-era camps convinced Germany to add Bulgaria to the list of countries from which former slave labourers could apply for compensation. The change makes Jewish victims from 112 Bulgarian camps eligible for monthly pensions and a one-time payment. As well, the Claims Conference has identified more Jewish victims of Nazi medical experiments and sent them compensation. It identified 704 victims of 178 different kinds of gruesome experiments in more than 30 concentration camps or ghettos. Each victim was sent a one-time payment from a German fund of $5,400 (US). Already, 1,178 such survivors have received funds since last January.

Presbyterians Criticized

NEW YORK — B'nai B'rith has called for an end to interfaith dialogue with the U.S. Presbyterian church. It cited three decisions by the church at its recent general assembly: to fund conversion missions targeting Jews; to divest holdings in Israel and call on others to do so; and labelling Israel an apartheid state. "For a dialogue to take place between two parties – interfaith or political – both sides must accept the right of the other to exist," B'nai B'rith said. The church has some three million U.S. members.

Al-Jazeera ruling evokes varied response

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada's two main Jewish advocacy groups had divergent responses to this month's contentious regulatory decision allowing Al-Jazeera to air in Canada, with Canadian Jewish Congress welcoming the stringent regulations placed on the Arabic all-news channel and B'nai Brith Canada turning thumbs down to the ruling altogether.

And cable providers are still trying to make sense of the decision to approve Al-Jazeera, saying that restrictions put in place by the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) are so onerous and impractical that it's hard to see how the network will air in Canada at all.

In a ruling that has had editorial pages and talk shows bubbling with opinions on free speech for the past two weeks, the CRTC on July 15 approved the carriage of the controversial Qatar-based news station, which has been accused of airing virulent anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, but the commission ruled that cable and satellite providers must "alter or delete" Al-Jazeera programming to ensure that no "abusive comment" is broadcast.

The decision also requires cable providers to continuously record Al-Jazeera programs "in the event of any future concerns about abusive comment."

The broadcast regulator said its ruling will "minimally" impair freedom of expression.

The Canadian Cable Television Association (CCTA), which had lobbied the CRTC to carry Al-Jazeera on behalf of some 80 cable companies, complained that the requirement to scrutinize, edit and, in effect, censor the network may make it all but impossible for its members to add the service to their listings.

The CCTA said that the CRTC's ruling will require cable companies to monitor Al-Jazeera around the clock and make decisions about what to air and what to cut.

Stated Michael Hennessy, CCTA president: "Cable companies do not want to be forced into the position of having to decide what is appropriate for Canadians to watch. This sets a frightening precedent and virtually ensures that no distributor will ever carry this service in Canada."

Taanta Gupta, a spokesperson for Rogers Cable, Canada's largest cable company, was quoted as saying that the chances of any cable firm carrying Al-Jazeera are "pretty slim."

After calling on the CRTC to bar Al-Jazeera a year ago, CJC welcomed the commission's strict broadcast conditions.

"By specifying these licensing conditions on Al-Jazeera distributors, the CRTC has struck an appropriate balance between freedom of expression and the obligation under Canadian law and broadcast regulations prohibiting discriminatory and hateful speech," Congress president Ed Morgan said in a statement.

"Because of the history of anti-Semitic comment on Al-Jazeera, our first choice was not to have this broadcaster distributed in Canada. However, we are pleased that the alternatives CJC recommended to the CRTC to protect minority communities in Canada from vilification while still protecting free speech have been accepted."

B'nai Brith Canada rejected the ruling altogether, saying it has "challenged" the CRTC's decision.

"It is a sad state of affairs when an Arab-language network that is widely known for incorporating hateful messaging and anti-Semitic themes into its programming is granted a license to operate here in Canada," B'nai Brith said in a news release.

"Government officials say that anti-Semitism and bigotry will not be tolerated in this country. The CRTC ruling conveys just the opposite. It effectively provides official approval for incendiary programming to be broadcast."

It also noted that in the wake of the commission's decision not to renew the licence of a popular French-language Quebec City radio station because of offensive content, the Al-Jazeera "decision shows an inconsistent approach in relation to stations broadcasting offensive and inflammatory material."

News musings

From the editor's desk

When you take a week's vacation, the news piles up. I comment upon only a small selection.

"The only way to deal with terrorists is to bring them to justice and to close rank."

This is the plea that successive Israeli prime ministers have made to the civilized world since the first PLO, Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine or like-minded murderers Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, struck down the life of an innocent civilian in the name of their hate-distorted cause.

But wait. These words were not spoken by Ariel Sharon.

They were the heartfelt cry of Iraqi Prime Minister Iyad Allawi directed to an increasingly vulnerable world, at a press conference on the weekend in, of all places, Damascus. Allawi was surely not directing his words to the government of Syria, which continues to be a funder, sponsor and enthusiastic booster of terrorism. Rather, he was likely speaking from his unlikely rostrum to the government of Egypt, in the wake of the kidnapping of an Egyptian diplomat in Baghdad.

At least nine people were kidnapped in Iraq in the week beginning last Monday, when the Philippine government completed withdrawing its troops there in exchange for the life of a Filipino truck driver.

Emboldened by the temerarious timidity of the governments of the Philippines and of Spain, the terrorists have clearly decided to press what has become their woeful advantage.

Thus it is not surprising that Australia has now been threatened by Al Qaeda. Alter its foreign policy, Osama bin Laden dictates to Canberra, or suffer the consequences. To its everlasting credit, the Australian government refuses to surrender its freedom to the fanatic's evil dictates.

Hatred and terror are their own justifications. No "root causes" bring justice to the deliberate targeting and slaughter of innocents. Pandering to the bully, appeasing the thug, currying favour with the terrorist are the surest path to ruin. This is a truism we hope our own government understands. Alas, we see little evidence of that understanding in the parliament of the European Union.

The watershed incident of terror on this continent, of course, was Sept. 11, 2001.

Last week the 9/11 commission finally released its long-awaited report to the public, some 567 pages of meticulous detail, including 116 pages of footnotes. By all accounts, it is a superb document, tightly written and boldly forceful. Among the report's many recommendations is a call to overhaul the American intelligence establishment and to treat the terror threat urgently.

One of the findings of the report, according to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), was that "long before the Sept. 11 attacks, Al-Qaeda was planning terrorist attacks against Israeli and American Jewish sites."

The report shows that anti-Semitism and raw hatred of Israel, of Jews and of the United States were among the driving motivations for the terrorism. Apparently Al Qaeda had developed a plan to attack Eilat. They had intended to recruit a Saudi air force pilot to commandeer a Saudi jet and then crash it into the Israeli port city. Bin Laden supported the plan, the report states, but it was put on hold to enable the group to focus on the Sept. 11 atrocities.

Israeli authorities were not surprised by the commission's report. Nor were the leaders and spokespersons of the American Jewish community.

"We didn't need this report to tell us that Jews were and are a target," Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, told JTA.

Canada's profile among the terrorists is far lower than that of the United States. And thus, we may not be within their sights. Yet. But since we are a western democracy, is it not only a matter of time?

Our government must be ready.

No further evidence is necessary to prove the topsy-turvy, morally inverted state of the United Nations.

But how can one ignore the following?

Last week in the Security Council, Russia, China, Pakistan and Algeria opposed issuing a threat of sanctions against the government of Sudan for its support of the marauding and murderous Arab janjawid militia against black fellow countrymen.

As of this writing, the resolution had not yet come to a vote. Council delegates were still trying to find appropriately acceptable language.

If ever a conflict cried out for sanctions against one of the parties, this one does. More than 30,000 black Sudanese have been killed in the conflict. Millions have been made homeless and now face the ghastly and unimaginably cruel spectre of starvation.

The governments of Russia and China – whose judicial representatives were among the 14 judges on the International Court of Justice in the Hague – found no difficulty in condemning Israel's security wall. But regarding the ongoing degradation, expulsion, starvation and slaughter of the black Sudanese of Darfur, they are equivocating.

ZEMER CHORALE CELEBRATES 25 YEARS:

The Zemer Chorale of Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue recently celebrated its 25th anniversary. Founded and directed by Charles Heller, whose arrangements and compositions have been performed in recordings, concerts and broadcasts, the group has a diverse repertoire and performs in Hebrew, Yiddish, Ladino, Russian, French and English. The choir is largely made up of members of Beth Emeth but also welcomes singers from the community. In 1996, the group received the Silver Jubilee Award of the Ontario Choral Federation. The Zemer Chorale is seen performing at Holy Blossom Temple last year. Conductor Charles Heller is second from the right.

Jerusalem the focus of economic revitalization project

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jerusalem-based lawyer and venture capitalist Alan Feld is all business – organized, articulate and armed with statistics – when he talks up his latest volunteer involvement, an endeavour aimed at bringing Israel's capital out of an economic slump.

But there's a passion behind the facts and figures that is evident when Feld discusses the non-profit organization StartUp Jerusalem, and, more overtly, when the 42-year-old Toronto native recalls his reasons for moving to Jerusalem three years ago, seven years after making aliyah.

"I love the place," he said in a phone interview during a recent visit to Toronto. "There's no more amazing city in the world than Jerusalem… It's such a fundamentally important place, not only for the Jewish people [but] for everybody."

Capital is now the poorest city in Israel

Earlier this summer, Jerusalem "earned the unfortunate title of the poorest city in Israel," edging out Bnei Brak, Feld said.

"I think one of the major issues is that a lot of young, well-educated people are leaving the city. Over the last decade, about 6,000 people a year have left, and of those, over 50 per cent have had bachelor's degrees or higher. Fifty per cent of them were between the ages of 24 and 35."

Underemployment, said Feld, is one of the reasons people leave.

With StartUp Jerusalem, "we're trying to create or foster the creation of more employment in the city, in higher paying jobs," said Feld, who is chairing the project. It was started four months ago by high tech entrepreneur Nir Barkat, a candidate for mayor of Jerusalem last year, and is being managed by Eli Kazhdan, the former chief of staff for the Israeli Minister of Trade and Industry.

Another key figure is Harvard University business professor Michael Porter, an "international guru" on competitiveness among nations – and StartUp Jerusalem's honorary chair – who has worked on similar projects in other countries.

The Jerusalem initiative, which aims to create thousands of jobs within five years, will focus on three areas: medical, health and biotech; outsourcing and business services; and spirituality and tourism.

Jerusalem already has some competitive advantages in these sectors, Feld said.

In the medical field, he said, there is "world class research" being done at Hadassah and Shaare Zedek hospitals, as well as at Hebrew University. The latter, he noted, is among the top 10 campuses in the world in generating patents from technology developed on site.

"What we're trying to focus on is attracting international companies to open up in Jerusalem, and helping foster domestic companies to create employment in Jerusalem."

The idea, Feld said, is based on Porter's philosophy of creating "cluster models" of people and organizations whose work ties into the area being focused on.

In business outsourcing, Feld noted, Jerusalem's existing assets include a well-educated workforce, cultural similarity to Europe and North America, and the many languages spoken in the city.

The plan for tourism will be closely modelled on Porter's work in Turkey, where he brought together people from diverse sectors, including hotel representatives and archeologists, to create "attractive packages."

Jerusalem has few rivals when it comes to archeological, historical and spiritual infrastructure, Feld said, but "if you look at [number of] nights in hotels, and dollars spent, the amount is far less in Jerusalem than in Tel Aviv, for example."

StartUp Jerusalem has received letters of support from Ehud Olmert, Israel's deputy prime minister and minister of industry, trade, labor and communications; Natan Sharansky, minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora affairs; and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Organizers also hope North American businesspeople will provide financial and practical support, which Feld said is already starting to happen.

In addition to bringing sectors together, StartUp Jerusalem has a diverse board of 18 people, including Arab hotel owner Sami Abu-Dayyeh and Adina Bar Shalom, CEO of the Ultra-Orthodox College.

"We have very different views of the city's future," Feld said. "But everybody feels a commonality when it comes to the economic future of the city, and making sure it can be strong."

Jabotinsky remembered as Israel faces tough decisions

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A number of audience members interrupted Israeli consul general Yaacov Brosh with cries of "Shame, Shame," "No, no, no," and "Never" when he suggested at a memorial for Ze'ev Jabotinsky last week that Israel has to give up some of its "historical rights."

At the Monday evening event, co-sponsored by Herut-Likud Canada, B'nai Brith Canada, the Hadar Centre, State of Israel Bonds and Betar-Tagar, and held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Brosh recalled the Zionist leader, who died in 1940, as a "romanticist, but at the same time a very practical person."

Just as Jewish Palestinians had to cede the east bank of the Jordan River in 1921, "today after more than 80 years we stand in a position where we have to give up again some of our historical rights," Brosh said. "We're not happy to do it, we don't want to do it, but we must do it for ourselves and for our future."

> Zionist leader a 'romanticist, but at the same time a very practical person'

Brosh, who otherwise spoke without incident, offered lessons that he said were the legacy of Jabotinsky: to continue to be sensitive to human life and human rights, to "stretch our hands to people and nations who want peace with us," and to "stand very strong against nations and people who don't want to accept our existence and our rights."

Israel is committed to building a stronger, and flourishing, society, he said.

The crowd of approximately 500 people included students affiliated with Betar-Tagar, the youth arm of Herut-Likud and another Jabotinsky legacy.

Rose Lax, who is succeeding Harry Wolle as president of Herut-Likud, presented four Ze'ev Jabotinsky National Awards for Campus Activism.

The recipients were Patrick Amar, former president of Concordia Hillel and more recently a co-ordinator with Hasbara Fellowships in New York; Josh Cooper, a candidate in the recent federal election who has been active in helping students combat campus anti-Semitism; Paul Cooper, the co-founder of the Young Zionist Partnership who won the presidency of York University's Federation of Students after a lengthy, well-publicized battle involving conflict between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students; and David Horowitz, campus affairs officer for B'nai Brith and founder of Betar-Tagar at the University of Toronto.

Journalist Martin Himel, the keynote speaker, discussed "media minefields," pointing out disproportionate or one-sided coverage that sometimes gives the impression "that Israel is the most menacing country in the world."

He compared coverage of events in Jenin in 2002 – which he dealt with in his documentary Jenin: Massacring Truth – when 26 Palestinians were killed in an Israeli incursion designed to root out suicide bomb-makers, to the less prominent coverage of the expulsion of 1.2 million black Africans from the Darfur region of Sudan, and "thousands of women raped and untold [numbers of] children killed."

The next big media minefield involves accusations that Israel is an apartheid state, said Himel, who believes Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is trying to avert those criticisms with his recent decision to pull Jewish communities from Gaza, thus "removing from the equation" at least 1.5 million Palestinians.

"The price might be very heavy, but it is an issue that has to be raised," Himel said.

Other participants in the program were B'nai Brith president Harold Davis; Ron Furman of Betar; Avi Ben-Zvi, president of Zionists at McMaster; Shoel Silver, president of Canadian Friends of the Menachem Begin Heritage Foundation, and cantor Rudy Bromberg.

Canada is a highly regarded friend of Israel. One need only speak to policy-makers in Israel or members of Israel's foreign service or read the political commentaries about Canada's relations with the Jewish state that occasionally appear in the Israeli press to confirm this observation. For example, in Israel, Canada's abstention last week in the vote on the UN General Assembly's resolution demanding that Israel comply with the contentious, deeply flawed decision by the International Court of Justice concerning the security fence was viewed in a positive light. We however, as Canadians, take a dimmer view.

We expect more. We expect our government to vote in the UN, indeed in every international venue, in a manner that affirms the values that Canadians cherish. High among those values, of course, are justice and fairness.

Surely, at the roll call in the General Assembly last week, justice and fairness would have meant opposing the obviously malign intent of the drafters of the resolution toward the Jewish state. It would have meant standing resolutely against the blatant corruption of the court's legal process. It would have also meant supporting a fellow democracy in its vanguard struggle against the forces of tyranny and terrorism.

Reynald Doiron, a Foreign Affairs spokesperson told The CJN that Canada's vote was consistent with its position on the security fence. To be sure, Canada's abstention was a vastly higher statement of values and principles than the bloc vote of the European Union, some members of which, by voting in unison, even contradicted their own earlier positions against the sham legal proceedings in the Hague. But, as Canadians, we beseech our government, especially in disputes where matters of life and death are at stake, to aspire higher than the technocrat's ideal for consistency. Rather, Canada must always aspire to the more important democratic ideal of justice.

Remember AMIA

The youngest victim, Sebastian Barreiro, was 5 years old; the oldest victim, Faiwel Dyjament, was 73. Along with them, 83 others were killed and some 300 people were wounded when the AMIA Jewish community center in Buenos Aires was bombed by terrorists 10 years ago on July 18, 1994. A trial against several Argentines suspected of involvement in the attack has been under way for several years, but no one has been convicted.

The building was targeted for one reason. It was the Jewish community centre. For the vile perpetrators, that was sufficient justification. Their hatred is a sick and evil contempt against which all freedom-loving peoples around the world – not just Jews – must be on guard.

But while we stand on guard, we must also remember the victims of that hatred. We must remember the AMIA.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Land is disputed, not Palestinian

In his letter, "Court ruling better than nothing" (CJN, July 15), Jordy Cummings refers to the decision of Israel's Supreme Court regarding the "security barrier" (his quotes) "on Palestinian land" (his quotes).

Given this, I wonder if Cummings is of the view that the Old City of Jerusalem, where Jews had lived continuously for more than 3,000 years before being expelled by Jordan in 1949, also constitutes "occupied Palestinian land" (my quotes). The territories occupied by Israel after the 1967 war are not now, nor have they ever been, "occupied Palestinian land." They are disputed territories, and the final determination of their status has yet to be determined. A reading of UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, which remain the cornerstones on which any Middle East peace agreement will be based, make this abundantly clear. To state otherwise is simply incorrect.

CJC wrong on Al-Jazeera

It is upsetting enough to read that Al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based anti-democratic and anti-Semitic network, has been cleared for Canadians to view, but it was even more upsetting to read Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan's comments to various media on this unfortunate precedent.

The CJC and Morgan have been quoted as applauding this decision. The CJC has once again lost its moral grounding. Instead, it expressed its gratitude to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), an organization that should be criticized and condemned. When will Congress and its president speak for the Canadian Jewish community? The counterproductive statements by Morgan discredit the dismay that many of us in the Jewish community feel about Al-Jazeera being allowed into our country.

UN should move to Switzerland

Nathan Pila's comments ("Should not tolerate the UN," CJN, Letters to the editor, July 8), in reference to Bert Raphael's July 1 letter were right on the mark. My only objection to the Pila letter is that he was being too kind and diplomatic.

The United Nations richly deserves its nickname, "the Asylum." The food-for-oil program supervised by the UN enriched Saddam Hussein and the petty bureaucrats of the UN to the tune of literally billions of dollars, among other corrupt actions. I suggest that your readers look at American writer Jed Babbin's Inside the Asylum to get a view of how widespread the ineptitude and incompetence is in this dirty organization. I totally agree with Pila. Who cares how they vote and for what purpose? It's about time they packed their bags and set up tents somewhere in Europe. How about Switzerland? They might feel more at home there and would definitely be better received.

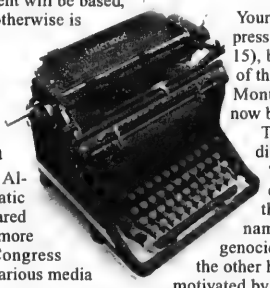
Hate crime confusion



Your front page article, "Jewish groups won't press for hate charges in UTT case" (CJN, July 15), begs for a clarification. The firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs School (UTT) in Montreal was a hate-motivated crime and is now being prosecuted as such.

Though we do not, in common parlance, differentiate between a "hate crime" and a "hate-motivated crime," the Criminal Code does. "Hate crimes" are acts that violate the specific hate provisions of the code, namely prohibitions against "inciting genocide," or "public incitement of hatred." On the other hand, under the code, any crime that was motivated by hate of a specific group is considered a "hate-motivated crime" and this, if proven, is taken to be an aggravating factor during sentencing, making for a much harsher sentence than might otherwise have been imposed.

The firebombing was clearly aimed at instilling fear and apprehension in the Jewish community. What is abundantly clear is that UTT was targeted because it is a Jewish institution and that the motivation for attacking it was one of hatred for Jews.

Since we first learned about the dastardly attack, B'nai Brith Canada has done everything in its power to bring the perpetrators to justice, even going to the point of raising the reward offered in the case to $50,000. We have been in constant contact with the police and prosecutors to ensure that they do not spare any effort in investigating and prosecuting those responsible.

We will continue to monitor and evaluate the legal proceedings to ensure that justice is rendered and that the hate-motivation for this crime is properly reflected in the charges and sentencing of the perpetrators.

A tale of two courts and two rulings

By BEN ARCHIBALD

This month's advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice (ICJ) on "The Legal Consequences of The Construction Of a Wall In The Occupied Palestinian Territory" further reinforces the international community's obsession with censuring Israel for any and all policies it implements while defending itself from the horrors of Palestinian terrorism.

It is tragically ironic that indiscriminate terror attacks against Israeli population centres have not outraged the United Nations or the world's left-wing peace movements enough to condemn, or mobilize against, Palestinian terrorism. By contrast, Israel's responses to the unyielding assault on its citizens continue to meet with the international community's moral opprobrium. The very fact that judges on the ICJ are elected by UN member states has the effect of barring Israeli judges from ever obtaining a seat on the international court. However, jurists from dictatorships and "thugocracies" are in a position to judge Israel's behaviour, reflecting the size of the grain of salt Israel should take when digesting the ICJ's opinion.

Despite the ICJ's inherent bias, one cannot help but feel discouraged by both the tone and substance of its advisory opinion, which largely ignores the fact that from September 2000 until April 2004, Palestinian terror groups carried out more than 780 attacks within Israel and 8,200 attacks within the disputed territories. The ICJ held that "the court, from the material available to it, is not convinced that the specific course Israel has chosen for the wall was necessary to attain its security objectives."

Naturally, the ICJ drew this sweeping conclusion without any substantial analysis of the factual circumstances and the military exigencies leading to the Sharon government's decision to build the separation barrier. As Justice Thomas Buergenthal noted in his dissent, "lacking is an examination of the facts that might show why the alleged defenses of military exigencies... are not applicable to the wall as a whole or to the individual segments of its route. The court says that it is 'not convinced' but it fails to demonstrate why it is not convinced, and this is why these conclusions are not convincing."

Israel should take the ICJ conclusion a step further and respond that what is lacking is any semblance of good faith on the part of the United Nations General Assembly and the ICJ. This is why the advisory opinion should be placed in the dust bin while Prime Minister Ariel Sharon works to comply with the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court in the case of Beit Sourik Village Council v. the Government Of Israel.

The Beit Sourik decision is not an easy one to digest. In Beit Sourik, the Supreme Court held that the Government of Israel must re-route portions of the separation barrier due to the hardships that the planned route would cause the Palestinian petitioners. Many critics of judicial review are surprised that Israel's Supreme Court would override military experts with respect to the specific route of the separation barrier. While the Supreme Court certainly has the jurisdiction to review the procedural implementation of land seizures, appeals and payments of compensation for the loss of private land, it is startling to some that it would assume a role in the substantive review of the barrier's specific route. Furthermore, the Supreme Court's language may be difficult for some of Israel's supporters to comprehend. Despite these two concerns, the decision and the response of the Israeli government to it are a tribute to the unending depths of Israeli resolve to build a just and democratic state governed by the rule of law. Perhaps more importantly, the Supreme Court's decision can be contrasted with the ICJ's blatantly biased one in order to demonstrate that Israel is in fact capable of responding to harsh criticism when it comes from a legitimate source.

In reaching a conclusion, the three-judge panel, led by court president Aharon Barak, outlined the fact that Israel holds the disputed territories in belligerent occupation, and as such, has a responsibility towards the population living within the territory. However, unlike the ICJ, the Supreme Court did not ignore the established international legal principle that responsibility toward the population within the territory must be balanced against the legitimate security interests of the holder of the territory. As Justice Barak held, "the obligation of the military administration... is to preserve the order and public life of the local population, but to do so while properly balancing between the interests of the population in the territory and the military and security needs of soldiers and citizens located in the territory."

It is this balance, the Supreme Court held, that must be struck by the military in setting the route of the temporary separation barrier as a response to terror attacks, which it noted are "directed against citizens and soldiers, men and women, elderly and infants, regular citizens and public figures. Terror attacks are carried out everywhere: in public transportation, in shopping centres and markets, in coffee houses and restaurants. Terror organizations use gunfire attacks, suicide attacks, mortar fire, Katyusha rocket fire and car bombs."

Despite all of the horrifying facts considered by the Supreme Court, the judicial and executive branches of the Israeli government are engaged in a sustained dialogue on how to respond to terror without unduly upending the lives of the Palestinian population in the disputed territories. It is unfortunate that the international community cannot seriously take part in this dialogue, given the cynical manipulation of international institutions by Israel's detractors.

Declaring the separation barrier legal, the Israeli Supreme Court imposed a standard of "proportionality" in its construction. As noted by the court, the principle of proportionality focuses "on the relationship between the objective whose achievement is being attempted, and the means used to achieve it." The objective of defending Israel and its citizens justifies the building of a separation barrier along a line that maximizes Israel's security interests. However, the proportionality principle subjects the route of the barrier to a test that considers the route's impact on the lives of Palestinians living in the disputed territories.

The effect of the decision in Beit Sourik has been real and immediate for both the Palestinian petitioners and the Israeli government. Although Israel may build the barrier within the disputed territory and beyond the Green Line, it has a duty to mitigate the harm the barrier will inevitably cause the Palestinian population in the disputed territories. Similarly, the effect of the decision of the ICJ has been real and immediate in slandering Israel and undermining the very purpose and promise of international law – to defend the defenceless – as evidenced by the ensuing debate of the advisory opinion in the General Assembly.

Left-wing peace activists and advocates of international law need to re-consider their serial opposition to any and all things Israeli if they are actually interested in their stated aim of creating a viable and peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. From Durban to the Hague, no amount of legal formalism or pomp and circumstance will create a peaceful life for Israelis and Palestinians. Time and again, the international community has created dubious forums for Israel-bashing, which yields neither peace nor security.

Instead, it justifiably hardens Israel's opposition to international involvement in its affairs and renders international institutions irrelevant in bettering the lives of ordinary Israelis and Palestinians. The international community should pause and read the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court in Beit Sourik and observe the response of Israel's government. Should the justices at the Hague and left-wing peace activists want Israel to return their calls, they must stop cynically isolating Israel, and, at the very least, acknowledge its plight. One would hope international courts and peace activists are interested in peace. Sadly, hope must triumph over experience for Israel to have any faith in the goodwill of the international community.

Having just experienced my son's wedding – my baby, my mezinik – I want to extol the artform of dance. Dance is merely human movement to some rhythm. But it is no simple matter.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

It might be uncomplicated and basic, but superficial it is not. It enables complete human expression like no other form. It addresses our needs to move and to involve our entire body in articulating our emotions and our experiences. It is useful for all types of ritual and human interaction.

Dance comes in many forms. At the wedding, we danced in so many different ways and styles. From line dances, to circles, from folk to pop, from couples to groups, each represented our attempt to celebrate.

And wow did we celebrate. We followed the wonderful Jewish tradition that commands guests to dance in order to make the couple happy. Whether they sat in chairs or twirled in circles, the bride and groom were happy and knew we were doing it for them.

But we did it for us, too. The movement emanated from, and generated, joy – and a lot of sweat. To the tune of Kaitsad Mirakdim ("How do we dance before a bride?"), we found crazy ways to join and romp. We just danced and mimed for the fun of it; for the enjoyment and entertainment; and for the bride and groom.

It seems to me that we as a community have lost contact with our heritage in this respect. When the Jews were liberated from Egypt, Miriam led the women in song and dance, as we read in Exodus: "And Miriam the prophetess… took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dance." That dance was a show of gratitude to God for redeeming the people. It was a prayer.

But what would happen if I and a group of women stood up in synagogue and started dancing? Truly, it would be unacceptable. I don't know if the swaying (shuckling) of people in prayer is a minor form of dance, but I do know it is helpful to involve one's entire body in the moment. I am certainly grateful we still dance at simchahs like weddings.

In my daughter's wedding speech, she noted that the glass broken under the chupah reminds us that in the moment of our great happiness, we must remember the heartbreaking reality of the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem. But, she said, in our troubled times, we must equally remember the existence and experience of great gladness. I agree.

"Life may not be the party we hoped for, but while we're here, we should dance" (anonymous, The Gazette, Montreal, July 12, 2004).

Let's dance!

Remembering my father, the minister

As the yahrzeit for my father approaches, I think about the way he led his life and about how I, as a daughter, met his expectations for me.

His family was from the "leather-apron class," small businessmen and craftsmen, good Evangelical Christians. They descended, so the family story goes, from Hessian soldiers brought over to fight King George's war and were captured by George Washington on his daring Christmas Day raid on their camp near Trenton, N.J., during the American Revolution.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

They settled in the German-speaking Pennsylvania farm country, but eventually moved to the city, where my father grew up and entered his father's painting and paper-hanging business.

My parents met at church. Mother was the preacher's eldest daughter, just fired from her teaching job as the Depression worsened (superfluous women lost their jobs to men who were the anointed breadwinners in those days). Their love story wouldn't make a dramatic movie, but it was deep and lifelong.

Mother thought she had married a prosperous businessman. But one day he told her he "felt the call" and decided to become a minister. He held a variety of parishes until his retirement. My mother, an accomplished musician and mathematics teacher, followed him and, as was the custom, enriched his ministry as church organist, Bible teacher and choirmaster.

Who was my father? He was a straightforward, honest and kind man with a simple faith that made him a good shepherd for his flock. He led with a kindly hand. He was a peacemaker for situations in and out of his ministry. He never turned away beggars who found their way to our door with regularity.

He had a wonderful sense of humour, and was a great storyteller. People, women especially, warmed to him immediately, and he loved a crowd. Our home was always full of guests and laughter.

I was his only child, and clearly not a boy. He sighed inwardly and taught me to ride a bicycle, play baseball (to the detriment of the church's stained-glass window), roller-skate, put up and take down screens and storm windows, carry out ashes from the coal furnace, drive a car at age 16, hammer a nail and generally behave like a boy until I was about 14, when the world changed.

He forbade me to leave the house in blue jeans. They were for working men, certainly not for young ladies. And he expected I would take a secretarial course and marry a nice religious boy.

He was a very stubborn man once an idea had taken hold, and only my mother could change his mind. So, with his reluctant blessing, I went to university, not secretarial school and into the Peace Corps, not into business, and I did marry a nice religious boy – but he was Jewish.

I know this caused my father pain, not because he didn't love his son-in-law and his three grandchildren, but because he genuinely feared for our immortal souls. Until the day he died, I think he could not reconcile this love and fear.

We had wonderful times together, travelling to Israel twice. He loved the place and the people, whom he saw as present-day Daniels, and he visited scenes he had only read about in the Bible – a dream fulfilled.

Do I see in myself my father? I am a stubborn woman once an idea has taken hold, and only my husband can change my mind. I rejoice in a weird sense of humour, and I try to be the compassionate person my father was. While I could not share his beliefs, either religious or political, I was proud of him, and I hope he was proud of me.

Do our children in turn see themselves in us? Will they see me in themselves when the time comes for the rabbi to pronounce my eulogy? I hope at least the good things will be reflected in the lives they lead. How like my parents I am, not in the way I lead my life or in the choices I make, but in my approach to life, the inner part of my being.

My father cared deeply for people and their lives on earth, as well as the eventual destiny of their souls. While I admittedly do not worry about the soul's destiny, I hope that his life's mantra – do good to your fellow man – influences the choices I make and will be the one thing I can bestow on my children.

A complete legal washout

The International Court of Justice advisory opinion on the legality of Israel's security fence is a shoddy piece of legal workmanship. It denies the right of self-defence against terrorism. It makes assumptions of fact against Israel that are contrary to reality without making findings of fact. It is self-contradictory, treating the West Bank and Gaza sometimes as a state and sometimes not, depending on whether it suits the ultimate outcome the judges want. It is such a mess that any lawyer familiar with international law would have to wonder how a group of judges could have been so far off the mark.

David Matas in Winnipeg

For all but one of the judges, the explanation is political. The court is an organ of the United Nations, and there is no doubt what opinion the General Assembly wanted the court to give.

The General Assembly resolution requesting the advisory opinion was an anti-Israel diatribe. The resolution did not ask the court to determine whether or not Israel is in violation of international law. In substance, the question the General Assembly posed was: what are the legal consequences of Israel's blatant violations of international law? Given the tendentious nature of the question, for the judges to have held Israel in compliance with international law would have meant thumbing their noses at the General Assembly.

Judges of the court are elected by the General Assembly – that is to say, by the very body posing the question. Members of the court are elected for nine years and may be re-elected. This system creates a bias. For the judges to have held that the Israel security fence conforms to international law would have been rejecting the firmly held views of those who put them on the court – and would be deciding whether or not they stay on the court.

The General Assembly elects judges to the court from candidates nominated from regional groupings. All the judges on the court but one were nominated from states or regions that had already declared that the fence is illegal. Even the European Union, long before the advisory opinion, had expressed the view that the fence violates international law. For many of the judges, a pro-Israel opinion would have been a career-ending move.

Just one judge, American Thomas Buergenthal, who voted in Israel's favour, was left to express an independent view, a view not tainted by a prior expression of legal opinion by those who would decide on the judge's future legal career. The U.S. Government, to my knowledge, has not expressed an opinion on the legality of the fence.

Yet, even Buergenthal's dissenting opinion was not all it should have been. He made some gratuitous legal comments about the illegality of Jews living in the West Bank and Gaza that are surprising and unfounded.

The problem with the Buergenthal opinion, though it is untainted by the bias from which every other opinion suffers, is that it is undermined by the failure to respect the rule that both sides must be heard. Buergenthal himself, when criticizing the opinions of his colleagues, took note of the fact Israel did not participate fully in the advisory court proceedings.

My own view is that, given the stacking of the court against Israel, Israel's less-than-full participation in the proceedings was wise. Israeli participation would have given an undeserved veneer of legitimacy to a kangaroo court.

But the absence of that full participation meant that none of the judges, including Buergenthal, had a fully argued case before him. In that situation, though the comments by Buergenthal against Israel were a good deal fewer and farther between than the adverse comments of the other judges, even his comments should not be given legal weight.

For these reasons, the opinion of the court is a complete legal washout that does not deserve to be taken seriously. It's being used as fodder for anti-Israel propaganda, but that's about all it's good for.

The Kirshner File

Separation fence has been militarily effective

The separation fence Israel is currently building through the West Bank and around Jerusalem, the subject of a stinging rebuke by the International Court of Justice earlier this month and a United Nations condemnation last week in which Canada abstained, has clearly worsened Israel's political problems.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Yet from a purely military point of view, the 788-kilometre fence, which is scheduled to be completed by the end of 2005, barring no unexpected delays in construction, has been a resounding success and enjoys the support of most Israelis.

Even Israelis who have grave reservations about its controversial route into the West Bank acknowledge that it has saved countless lives by making it infinitely more difficult for Palestinian terrorists, particularly suicide bombers, to infiltrate Israel.

In a nearly unanimous, but non-binding, decision on July 9, the court ruled that sections of the fence that veer into the West Bank breach international law and should be dismantled.

On July 20, by a wide margin, the UN General Assembly demanded that Israel comply with the ICJ's ruling.

The barrier, which is one-third complete, is problematic because it has imposed hardships on Palestinians, whose leadership opposes its route but not Israel's right to build a fence along the pre-1967 border.

Farmers have been cut off from their fields, children from their schools and the sick from hospitals, clinics and social services. The fence has also inhibited the movement of goods, a grievous blow to a Palestinian economy still reeling from the impact of the second intifadah, which broke out in September 2000.

Palestinian spokespeople claim that only 11 per cent of the fence, as presently planned, follows the old Green Line, and will force at least 270,000 Palestinians in 122 villages to live in closed areas.

According to a United Nations report, the fence – which has sparked a succession of clashes between Palestinian demonstrators and Israeli soldiers and exposed Israel to a fresh barrage of global criticism – will necessitate the expropriation of some 14 per cent of the West Bank, which would otherwise be incorporated into a Palestinian state as part of a two-state solution.

To the Palestinians, the fence – a combination of electric fencing, barbed wire, ditches, observation posts, patrol roads, footpaths and concrete walls – creates unilateral facts on the ground and is a pretext to gobble up and eventually annex large swaths of land.

But to the Israeli government, the fence is a defensive measure whose sole purpose is "to prevent terror," David Baker, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson and Israel's incoming ambassador to Canada, told me in an e-mail on July 13, four days after the court issued its scathing judgment.

When asked about its route, he wrote, "The only considerations are based on security and topography." In a commentary in The New York Times, Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's finance minister and former prime minister, claimed that a fence running along the Green Line would be indefensible.

Defenders of the fence – which will enclose about 80 per cent of the Jewish residents of the West Bank in settlement clusters on Israel's side – say that it does not constitute a permanent political border and can be torn down at will. But to the Palestinians, who originally brought the case to the ICJ, and to the Arab League, which raised the issue before the United Nations' General Assembly and called for sanctions should Israel fail to comply, Israel's arguments ring hollow.

In retrospect, the fence, along with vigorous military measures the Israeli army has taken in the past two years, has paid undeniable dividends.

Responding to the bloodiest single month of violence since the outbreak of the intifadah, capped by the suicide bombing in Netanya's Park Hotel on Passover that killed 30 civilians, Israel launched Operation Defensive Shield in March 2002.

The raids, the biggest in years, targeted the West Bank. Hundreds of key Palestinian terrorists were killed and arrested and their cells broken up. Excoriated abroad, the incursions seemed ineffective because the deadly suicide bombings did not taper off. But as time wore on, Israel's continuing raids had an impact, as did the targeted assassinations of prominent Hamas leaders, namely Sheik Ahmed Yassin and his successor, Abdul Aziz Rantisi.

More recently, as the Israeli army has confirmed, the Palestinian Authority has begun cracking down on terrorist activity and stopping the transfer of funds to the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a Fatah offshoot that has carried out numerous suicide bombings.

One can speculate about the PA's sudden interest in squelching terrorism, but one salient factor surely turns on Israel's planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, which is supposed to be implemented toward the close of next year.

As a result of all these measures, better intelligence gathering on Israel's part and the looming presence of the fence, terrorism has drastically dropped. This prompted Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz to observe: "We are seeing a new trend. The level of terror is slowly declining… The pressure is working."

The statistics tell the story graphically.

Palestinian bombers and gunmen from the northern half of the West Bank, where the fence has been finished, launched 89 attacks in 2002, the worst phase of the intifadah. The figure dropped to 46 in 2003. During the first six months of this year, even fewer attacks were recorded than during the same period last year.

Shaul Mofaz

All told, there has been a 75 per cent decrease in suicide and attempted suicide attacks so far in 2004. During this period, 58 would-be bombers were intercepted. Since March, when terrorists struck in Ashdod, killing 10 Israelis, there has been only one successful suicide attack. Exactly a day after the ICJ handed down its verdict, a 19-year-old Israeli female soldier waiting for a bus in Tel Aviv was killed by a remote-controlled bomb.

"It may not be fashionable to say so publicly, but the evidence at the moment suggests that [the fence] has made a huge difference and that, at least for the moment, the Israelis have the upper hand," Jane's Foreign Report, an authoritative security journal, reported two weeks ago.

Charles Krauthammer, a conservative syndicated columnist for The Washington Post, takes this train of thought one step further. Citing the relationship between the fence and the dramatic decrease in suicide bombings, he concluded that Israel has won a strategic victory because the intifadah has failed "to demoralize Israel, destroy its economy, bring it to its knees, and thus force it to withdraw and surrender to Palestinian demands, just as Israel withdrew in defeat from southern Lebanon in May 2000."

Krauthammer overstates his case. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who initially opposed the concept of a fence, probably would not have considered a full withdrawal from Gaza had the current intifadah not worsened in terms of lives lost. But Krauthammer's overall point concerning its effectiveness remains fundamentally valid. The barrier that partially separates Israel from the West Bank has proven to be as virtually impenetrable as the fence surrounding the Gaza Strip, which was built in the earliest days of the now-defunct Oslo peace process.

Only twice in the last decade has the Gaza fence been penetrated, and then only indirectly – first by two British Muslims, Omar Sharif and Asif Hanif, who passed through the border in the guise of tourists and bombed a nightclub in Tel Aviv near the U.S. embassy, and second, by Palestinian terrorists who were smuggled through the frontier in a crate and set off bombs in the port of Ashdod.

Observers agree that much of the fence snaking through the West Bank and around Jerusalem would have been completed by now had it not been for petitions presented to Israel's Supreme Court by the Palestinians on mainly humanitarian grounds.

On June 30, the Israeli court ordered the Defence Ministry, which is in charge of the project, to reroute a small portion of the fence near the Israeli town of Mevasseret Zion. The following day, the court froze construction on the southeastern edge of Jerusalem. And on July 6, it issued an interim injunction to halt work on a stretch east of Rosh Ha'ayin.

In contrast to their defiance over the ICJ verdict, Israeli officials from Sharon on down said they would obey these rulings and reroute the fence so that it does not create undue hardship for West Bank Arabs. But these apparently cosmetic adjustments will hardly satisfy Palestinians and their supporters.

In the face of continuing terrorism, and amid growing concerns about the fluid demographic picture (the proportion of Jews between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River has been dropping, despite the massive influx of Soviet Jews into Israel since the late 1980s), Sharon is determined to finish the fence down to the last kilometre, the sooner the better.

This August, Toronto may once again be targetted by missionaries. We anticipate Jews for Jesus and Chosen People Ministries will take to the streets of our city to distribute their missionary literature.

In response to this threat, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafleting campaign to alert and educate the public. We are seeking to train volunteers who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner.

If you would like to participate in this program and/or help support our vital work, please contact:

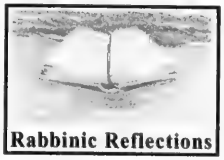
Jewish Life

Moral relativism undermines the Divine

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

The verdict of the International Court of Justice that Israel's security fence is illegal and must be dismantled to satisfy "humanitarian rights" is part of an unmistakable pattern at the United Nations.

I posit, however, that this is not just an attack against Israel, but also an attack against Judaism and God himself. The Bible is unequivocal about the relationship between the Holy Land and the Jewish people. It says the Land shall be given to the Children of Israel as an eternal inheritance. This is a strange concept, since the word inheritance usually refers to an estate passing from the deceased owner to the heir. Who died? Whose estate are we referring to?



The Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson of righteous memory, explained the unique connotation of the term "inheritance" regarding Eretz Yisrael by highlighting its meaning in halachic jurisprudence. When one legally buys an item, Halachah dictates that the object must first "leave" the original jurisdiction. By contrast, when one receives possessions via an inheritance, Halachah maintains, the object never "moves." Instead, the individual who inherits becomes the owner by stepping into the place of the original owner. The item doesn't "change hands" in order to legally belong to its new owner, but remains in its previous legal jurisdiction.

This means that when the Jewish people occupy Israel, in a sense they do so on behalf of God Himself.

It is said that history repeats itself. At the dawn of civilization, Genesis says, humankind's great evil and selfishness resulted in the mabul, the flood that destroyed most of the world's life. The scriptures tell us the generation that followed "spoke one language and had conforming ideas." They then united in a "global village" with a singular intent, namely, Rashi says: "Let us ascend to the sky and wage war against Him [God]." In fact, the scriptures tell us that the great tower in Babel had that very purpose.

The Rebbe, who himself narrowly escaped the Nazis, often referred to World War II in general (60 million dead), and the Holocaust in particular (six million Jews murdered), as the modern day mabul (genocidal flood). Eerily, the number of victims the war claimed closely resembles the probable number of the world's population in Noah's days.

Assuming the mabul metaphor is appropriate, history should have repeated itself. I would suggest that indeed it has. Out of World War II's genocide, the UN was born with an unprecedented unification of the world's governments. And yet, despite great hopes, the forces of hate and intolerance have consistently hijacked the UN in the name of righteousness and equality, and it has become a vortex of hate and discrimination directed primarily against the Jewish people and the State of Israel. It has failed miserably in protecting the global victims of brutality and oppression. By creating moral equivalence between terrorists and those who seek to preserve law and order, the UN has stained its spirit and succeeded in debasing the meaning of human rights.

The notion that ethos, ethics and morality are God-based is the essence of a divine involvement with earth and God's relationship with humankind. The respect for the intrinsic value and virtue of human life, which is at the root of "humanitarian rights," is important because we, the human race, were created in His image.

Finally, the concept of maintaining justice and a lawful, orderly society is based on the divinely-inspired laws that apply to everyone. In contrast, the new moral relativism undermines the concept of the divinely ordained and therefore precludes the possibility of absolute ethics, thereby coddling those who worship a cult of suicide, death and murder. This challenges the rudiments of the biblically prescribed sanctity of human life and perverts justice.

It also represents an attack against the most basic notion of Godliness. This is a battle about the very essence of religion, which maintains that humankind can and should have a relationship with God. History has indeed repeated itself, the Tower of Babel generation has returned.

I can only hope and pray that the UN will continue to evolve into irrelevance, and that an age of true unity and peace will soon be ushered in by our righteous Redeemer.

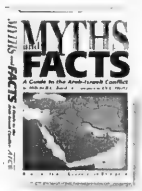
Israeli Supreme Court considers Palestinian grievances

MYTH:

Israel's Supreme Court ruled that the security fence is illegal and a land grab by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government.

FACT:



In a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee in 1989, Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz observed, "For the first time in Mideast history, there is an independent judiciary willing to listen to grievances of Arabs – that judiciary is called the Israeli Supreme Court."

That court took up the grievances of Palestinians who claimed the Israeli security fence causes hardships for them, is illegal according to Israeli and international law, and is meant to disguise the Israeli objective of annexing additional territory to Israel.

The Court ruled that a small segment of the fence – an 18-mile stretch near Jerusalem (out of the 125 miles built at that time) – needed to be rerouted because of the hardships caused to the Palestinians in the area who were cut off from their farms, schools and villages.

The Court also said, however, that it could not accept the argument that the fence's route was determined by politics rather than security. The justices rejected the idea that the fence should be constructed on the Green Line, noting that "it is the security perspective – and not the political one – which must examine a route based on its security merits alone, without regard for the location of the 'Green Line.'"

The justices also concluded: "It is permitted, by the international law applicable to an area under belligerent occupation to take possession of an individual's land in order to erect a separation fence upon it, on the condition that this is necessitated by military needs. To the extent that construction of the fence is a military necessity, it is permitted, therefore, by international law. Indeed, the obstacle is intended to take the place of combat military operations, by physically blocking terrorist infiltration into Israeli population centres."

The fundamental question for the Court was how to satisfy Israel's security concerns without causing disproportionate injury to the residents affected by the fence. The justices ruled that international humanitarian law and Israeli administrative law "require making every possible effort to ensure that injury will be proportionate. Where construction of the separation fence demands that inhabitants be separated from their lands, access to these lands must be ensured, in order to minimize the damage to the extent possible."

The justices acknowledged that the ruling would have an impact on the fight against terrorism. "We are aware this decision does not make it easier to deal with that reality. This is the destiny of a democracy: She does not see all means as acceptable, and the ways of her enemies are not always open before her. A democracy must sometimes fight with one arm tied behind her back. Even so, a democracy has the upper hand. The rule of law and individual liberties constitute an important aspect of her security stance."

The Supreme Court once again demonstrated that in Israel, the rule of law and judicial review is applied even to matters of national security and that it can balance the state's need to protect its citizens with humanitarian matters.

Though the Court's decision made the government's job of securing the population from terrorist threats more difficult, costly and time-consuming, Sharon immediately accepted the decision and began to reroute the section of the fence near Jerusalem. In addition, the Court's ruling is also being factored into the planning of the rest of the barrier.

Jewish Life

Handbook combines three volumes

The Complete How To Handbook For Jewish Living* by Kerry M. Olitsky and Ronald H. Isaacs, KTAV Publishing House, $25.

Books
Bernard Baskin

What are the 613 biblical commandments as arranged by Moses Maimonides? Who were the seven female prophets? What are the steps involved in obtaining a get, a Jewish bill of divorce? What are the husband's obligation to his wife as outlined in the Jewish marriage contract? What are the seven laws of Noah and why are they significant? What are the 39 labours traditionally prohibited on Shabbat? What are the basic rules for kashrut? What are the six divisions or orders of the Babylonian Talmud?

How do you make a living will? How do you act properly in making a shivah call? How to construct your own Jewish theology? How do you talk to your kids about God, or explain the idea of death to them? How do you put on tfillin or build a sukkah? How do you plan a spiritual trip to Israel? Who are the most important of the biblical and rabbinic commentators?

These are just some of the questions that are considered in this oversized paperbound volume of 560 pages, a compilation of three previous books by the same authors.

What follows are excerpts from some of the entries that I found especially interesting.

• There are 2,800 personal names in the Bible, some of which are used to name children today. All Hebrew names have meanings. Different communities have different naming customs. For example, Ashkenazic Jews generally do not name their children in honour of a living person (only in memory of someone who is dead) but Sephardic Jews have a system (beginning with the paternal grandfather) of honouring living people by naming babies in their honour.

• There is no specific time to erect a grave marker. It has become customary to do so at the conclusion of the first year of mourning, but it can take place anytime after 30 days. Unveilings may take place whenever grave visitations in general are permissible. Unveiling is a western custom that has evolved over time.

• It is customary for a mourner concluding shivah to take a walk around the block, "to get up from shivah," as a way of symbolically re-entering routine life. If you happen to make your call at the end of the shivah period, be prepared to take this walk with your bereaved friend or relative.

For a variety of reasons, which primarily have to do with focusing the attention of the mourners on the process of mourning rather than on themselves, it is customary to cover the mirrors in a shivah home.

• The word "amen" (meaning "may it be so") is found in the Torah as an affirmation used in the form of a response. In Deuteronomy 27:15-26, the people respond "amen" to a series of statements by the Levites.

When a person says "amen," he or she is publicly agreeing with what has just been said or endorsing it. It is an affirmation of one's belief.

Rabbi Chanina, a talmudic sage, stated that "amen" is an acronym for the three Hebrew words "El Melech Ne'eman," meaning "God, Faithful Ruler." As such, saying "amen" acknowledges God as Ruler.

Jewish law instructs us to respond "amen" after we hear another person recite a blessing.

Special features of The Complete How To Handbook For Jewish Living include key Hebrew words and phrases, a bibliography for each entry, and a 20-year calendar of Jewish holidays, starting in 2001/5762.

There are few readers who will not be enlightened – or perhaps even activated – by this manual. My advice: Obtain a copy for your family library.

Jews and the Olympics: glory and pain

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a couple of weeks, the entire world will be watching as elite athletes meet to compete in the 28th Olympiad in Athens. Although Jewish athletes have shared in Olympic glory, for Jews, the Olympics also have also included racism, violence and death. Today, a look at that history, courtesy the World Wide Web.

I never would have imagined that close to 700 hundred Jewish athletes have competed since the modern Games were first held in Athens in 1896. To find out more about them, I highly recommend the Jews in Sports website. More than a list, this site has researched biographies for 682 Jewish athletes who have competed in the Games. [www.jewsinsports.org/olympics_list.as] One of the stars of the first Games was Alfred Flatow of Germany, who brought home three gold and a silver in gymnastics. Those four medals tied Flatow with the second most in Athens. The International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame lists the medal count for every Jewish Olympian from Athens to Atlanta. [www.jewishsports.net/medalists.htm]

Yet, for Jews, the memory of the Olympics is not always pleasant. One of the greatest blots on the history of the Games is Nazi Germany's hosting of the 1936 Summer Olympics. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has a comprehensive site about those Games, starting in 1931 with the International Olympic Committee's awarding of the 11th Olympiad to Berlin. Although Hitler was elated with the Games and Germany's athletes captured the most medals overall, the site notes that 13 Jewish athletes and 10 African-American competitors (including Jesse Owens) won medals there. [www.ushmm.org/museum/exhibit/online/olympics/]

And, of course, there was the tragedy of the 1972 Munich Olympics, when Palestinian terrorists murdered 11 members of the Israeli Olympic delegation. The Olympics maintains a very large website, but I couldn't find a memorial to the slain athletes on it. There is one paragraph titled "The Games Must Go On!" that mentions the murders, the temporary suspension of the Games and the resolve of IOC President Avery Brundage that the Olympics continue. [http://tinyurl.com/3jp98] To learn more, I recommend a comprehensive section put together by Sports Illustrated to mark the 30th anniversary of the killings.[http://sportsillustrated.cnn.com/si_online/news/2002/08/20/main/] The Looksmart web directory has links to much more about the Munich Massacre and Israel's decision to hunt down the terrorists responsible for it. [http://tinyurl.com/6yu9z]

The 1988 Seoul Olympics provoked a different kind of controversy in Israel. Two Israeli yachtsmen who were in medal contention decided not to sail on Yom Kippur and finished fourth. However, another pair of Israelis did compete on Yom Kippur, and the Israeli Sports Association suspended them for five years. The yachtsmen appealed to the Israeli High Court – and won. As Steve Israel writes in his history of sport in Israel, this "case brought into center stage for discussion the issue of how much the athletes were competing for themselves and how much they were competing for the state." [http://tinyurl.com/2dub7]

Two of those best-known Jewish Olympians competed a half-century apart. The United States' Mark Spitz was the first athlete to win seven gold medals in a single Games. [http://espn.go.com/sportscentury/features/00016480.html] You can watch a short film about Spitz's Munich exploits at the Olympic website. [http://tinyurl.com/3c3gt] Britain's Harold Abrahams won gold in the 100-metre final at the 1924 Paris Olympics. Abrahams' story is well known, thanks to the 1981 film Chariots of Fire. [http://tinyurl.com/5oag9] (You can listen to a rendition of Vangelis' famous theme from that movie. [www.cws.per.sg/midi/themes.htm]

If you're not cut out for the 100-metre dash, or even a round of beach volleyball, there may still be a sport for you. A couple of sites have suggested events in which Jews could perform swifter, higher, stronger. Here are some from Ohr Somayach: the Clean and Jerk Torah Lift, Kippah Frisbee and Underwater Shofar Blowing. [www.ohr.org.il/judaism/humor/top10/olympics.htm]

Stuart Spector [http://tinyurl.com/2cvra] suggests such events as the Oyga Vault, a sound-enhanced pole vault competition in which the vaulter gains extra points for exclaiming, "Oy, such tsuris this is causing me!" My favourite, and what must be a truly gruelling competition, is the Naches Shlep, in which proud bubies and zaides have two minutes to boast about their grandchildren.

OAS should investigate 1994 Buenos Aires terrorism: Cotler

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Justice Minister Irwin Cotler called on the Organization of American States (OAS) last week to set up a task force to investigate the car bombing 10 years ago of the main Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires.

Cotler said the 34-member OAS, through its Inter-American Committee Against Terrorism, has a responsibility to become involved in the case, which he termed a "vicious anti-Semitic act" and the worst attack on a Diaspora community since World War II.

The perpetrators of the bombing – which killed 85 people, injured hundreds and destroyed the AMIA building – have never been found, although the trial of a number of suspected accomplices continues.

The Argentine government should make available "all necessary resources" including witnesses and evidence, Cotler said at a ceremony commemorating the anniversary of the bombing held at the Gelber Conference Centre by Canadian Jewish Congress, FEDERATION CJA and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Cotler also called on Iran and Syria to extradite any suspects and provide access to witnesses or evidence. International warrants have been issued for four Iranians believed to be connected to the attack.

He described the bombing as still causing "suffering to the Jewish community – individually and collectively – psychological, economically and morally." And he said Argentina must adopt a policy of "zero tolerance for hate and terrorism."

Federation first vice-president Richard Vineberg remarked that it was an "eerie sensation" holding the event on the Jewish Community Campus, because the AMIA complex was so similar. The attack was an "anti-Semitic outrage," he said, one motivated by a "baffling hatred beyond all reason."

Argentine consul general Jorge Riaboi stressed that his government views the July 18, 1994 bombing, as well as another deadly one at the Israeli embassy two years earlier, as terrorist acts that have affected all of Argentina.

"This is a national problem, not a community problem," he said.

Quoting a recent address by President Nestor Kirchner to the American Jewish Committee, Riaboi said the attacks "cause us pain and shame that we have not been able to arrest the culprits."

He said that Argentina "will not stop until justice is done in both attacks." He also underlined the 150-year history of Jews in Argentina and the government's policy of "fighting any expression of racism, including anti-Semitism."

CJC, Quebec Region, president Jeffrey Boro said the victims were "targeted solely because they belonged to a particular faith and ethnic community, because they were Jewish, because they were innocent civilians.

"We are here to underline that the lives tragically lost to terrorism have names, and so do their perpetrators. The architects of terrorism, they have names, too. They have addresses and they have financial and state support. As we remember, we also underline that those architects, those perpetrators, must be found, they must be prosecuted."

He said he welcomed Kirchner's recent opening of files related to the case, and urged the government to make available the human and financial resources needed to see that justice is served.

The commemoration, Boro said, offered an opportunity to "reflect on the fragility of our condition," given that terrorism has increased worldwide over the past decade.

There were a large number of recent immigrants from Argentina among the standing-room-only audience of 120. Among them was Meerta Chaya, who worked at AMIA for 24 years, but was absent at the time of the blast because of a school holiday. She is still seeking justice, she said.

Chaya, who emigrated to Montreal two years ago with her husband and four children, thanked the organizers for holding the commemoration, saying it helped make her feel part of the community.

"I loved my job in the administration of AMIA. I always felt at home. It was a busy, vibrant place, like this. We thought we were safe. We never thought anything like that could happen to us… Here in Montreal we have to realize this can happen anywhere."

Rallies mark AMIA anniversary

CJN News Services

NEW YORK — Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' board of governors and CJC acting executive director Manuel Prutschi joined leaders of the World Jewish Congress in New York last Monday for a rally and memorial service marking the 10th anniversary of the terrorist bombing of the AMIA Jewish community and cultural centre in Buenos Aires.

Gilbert Lewy, president of the DAIA (Delegacion De Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas) the political arm of the Argentine Jewish community, was among those who addressed the gathering.

The demonstration was one of many around the world commemorating the anniversary, including one the day before in Buenos Aires at the site of the rebuilt AMIA building attended by tens of thousands of people.

There were also events in Montreal and Winnipeg, where a July 18 ceremony in the Asper Centre's Berney Theatre began at 9:53 a.m., the exact time of the 1994 bombing. Attendees, who were encouraged to sign a petition urging Argentina to find and punish the AMIA perpetrators, watched a 10-minute film with footage of the attack's aftermath, the Winnipeg Free Press reported.

"Many of you sitting here knew people [in the AMIA centre]," event co-organizer David Kroft said, noting that Winnipeg's Jewish community is a sister community to Buenos Aires' and actively recruits Jewish immigrants from Argentina.

Earlier this month, CJC president Ed Morgan wrote to Argentina's ambassador to Canada, Arturo Bothamley, saying Congress welcomes "the commitment of [Argentine] President Nestor Kirchner to redress this terrible injustice," which in a speech earlier this year, Kirchner called "'a source of shame' and an 'affront against the Argentine people.'"

Morgan called the creation of the Unidad de Revelación (Collection of Information Unit), whose mandate it is to open up various secret files, "an important step forward."He also praised the appointment of a new judge and prosecutors, "but only if they are provided with all the necessary human and financial resources equal to the immensity of the task ahead."

N.Z. passport case won't hurt Canada-Israel relations, Cdn. official says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A political storm in which a dual Canadian and Israeli citizen has been jailed for illegally trying to obtain a New Zealand passport and accused of being a Mossad spy by Prime Minister Helen Clark won't affect Canada-Israel relations, a Department of Foreign Affairs spokesperson says.

"In this case, we don't believe it will have an impact on Canada's ties with Israel," and Ottawa won't make an issue out of it, Reynald Doiron said last week.

He was referring to Uriel Zoshe Kelman's use of a Canadian passport to enter and leave New Zealand, despite a pledge by Israel seven years ago that it would refrain from using Canadian passports in covert operations.

Doiron said Canada has not asked Israel for an official explanation of the New Zealand affair because Kelman – who, along with associate Eli Cara, was sentenced earlier this month to six months in jail by the Auckland High Court – acquired his Canadian passport legitimately.

"As a Canadian, [Kelman's] entitled to a Canadian passport," Doiron said from Ottawa. "Whatever he does with his life belongs to him."

Authorities in Wellington, New Zealand's capital, have concluded Kelman, 31, initially entered the country five years ago with a Canadian passport, and left after eight weeks with yet another Canadian passport.

The New Zealand case is reminiscent of a 1997 one in which two Mossad agents posing as Canadian tourists attempted to assassinate senior Hamas leader Khalid Mashal in Amman, Jordan, and were caught red-handed.

The incident forced Israel to release the spiritual leader of Hamas, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, who was killed by an Israeli strike in Gaza several months ago.

As a result of the Mashal affair, Canada temporarily recalled its ambassador in Tel Aviv and Israel promised to stop using Canadian passports.

New Zealand's foreign minister, Phil Goff, told Ha'aretz recently that he suspects Kelman and Cara, 50, tried to obtain New Zealand passports for an assassination operation in a third country.

Under questioning, the pair admitted taking part in a criminal conspiracy to obtain a New Zealand passport by fraudulent means.

In addition to jail time, Kelman and Cara were each ordered to pay $65,000 (US) to the Cerebral Palsy Association of New Zealand as a fine.

Last week, they announced they will appeal their sentences, Israel Radio reported.

Clark, New Zealand's prime minister, said she has "strong reasons" to suspect the men were "acting on behalf of Israel's intelligence service."

According to information that came out in court, they used the identity of a wheelchair-bound man suffering from cerebral palsy to apply for the passport.

The case has prompted New Zealand to impose diplomatic sanctions on Israel.

High-level visits to and from Israel will be suspended. Israelis visiting New Zealand in an official government capacity will be required to apply for visas. Approval for the appointment of the new Israeli ambassador to New Zealand will be delayed.

New Zealand has asked Israel to apologize, admit responsibility, provide an explanation and offer assurances that no such incident will occur again.

In a statement, Orna Sagiv, an Israeli diplomat based in Australia, declared that Israel values its relations with New Zealand and "will do everything possible to restore them to normal."

Ofir Gendelman, a spokesperson at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, sounded a similar theme. "We would like to maintain a good relationship with New Zealand. Israel values its relationship with New Zealand, and will exert a lot of effort to improve it."

Doiron said Kelman holds both Canadian and Israeli citizenship and is possibly a British citizen as well. He declined to say when Kelman immigrated to Israel, nor would he comment on the allegation he is a Mossad agent.

The media in New Zealand have reported that Kelman and Cara were employed by an Israeli company that designs surveillance systems and listening devices.

The firm in question, YTS Systems, says it designed security systems for six embassies and for buildings in the United States, Germany and Africa.

Cara also said he owned a travel agency in Sydney, Australia, where he had lived with his wife and children since 2001. But attempts to locate the agency proved fruitless, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported.

According to various reports, two other men were allegedly involved in the fraud. Zev William Barkan, who lived near the cerebral palsy sufferer and applied for the passport, has disappeared, while a fourth man suspected in the case remains unidentified.

Last week, it was reported that Barkan has held posts with Israeli missions in Austria and Belgium, and that he used his Canadian passport to work for an aid organization in North Korea.

After New Zealand froze relations with Israel, vandals last week smashed 16 headstones and gouged swastikas and Nazi slogans in a Jewish cemetery in Wellington.

Clark condemned the desecration. David Zwartz, head of the New Zealand Jewish Council, linked the vandalism with the passport case.

Elie Wiesel and Sarah Zelcer

The only two Canadians at a recent summit meeting organized by American Jewish World Services and other Jewish and non-Jewish humanitarian agencies to discuss the current crisis in Sudan say they are "cautiously optimistic" that the groups can be effective if they work together.

Sarah Zelcer, director of education and assistant director of international programs for Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, and Dr. Norman Epstein, founder of CASTS (Canadian Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan), travelled to New York to attend the summit, which featured Nobel Peace Prize-winner Elie Wiesel as a guest speaker.

Zelcer, who was "thrilled" to meet Wiesel, said he was "truly inspiring as he talked about our obligation as Jews to respond to the crisis. [He embodied] the spirit of 'Never again.'"

The summit, attended by some 60 organizations, received a first-hand report from two field workers with the International Rescue Committee and the International Crisis Group.

"They said they saw wells of water stuffed with human bodies, and they reported that out of 135 refugee camps, only 75 had been accessed by humanitarian groups," Zelcer said.

"There is a potential for at least one million people to die because of a lack of water."

The reports were incredibly disturbing, she said, "but necessary in order to motivate people to take action."

In her report to the meeting, Zelcer said, "I urged the committee to join with us and respond to the crisis."

She said Ve'ahavta is planning a "Never Again Day," in which she envisions "people marching to Ottawa, to the White House, to the UN. I see them rolling up their shirt sleeves and going out into the streets screaming 'Never again.'"

Her organization's three-pronged effort to deal with the crisis include raising awareness, raising funds for relief items, and engaging in hands-on relief efforts.

It currently has $100,000 worth of pharmaceuticals – including multi-vitamins, antibiotics and hydration fluids – donated by Walter Arbib, but needs to raise $25,000 to have them shipped from Holland, she said.

The group walked away from the meeting with an elevated sense of urgency and a heightened awareness, Zelcer said. "Elie Wiesel emphasized that feeling. We have to seize upon that. We have made an important first step."

Epstein said Canadians can take a leadership role in dealing with the crisis. "We must [unite] the western world and induce it to take action.

"In view of our current knowledge, we must invoke resolutions that insist if the genocide does not desist, multinational forces will go into Sudan to stop it and secure the area for humanitarian relief."

He said that if action is not taken immediately, "the death toll could eclipse the Rwanda genocide. This [fact] has been corroborated by many humanitarian groups."

The next few weeks are critical, Epstein said, because as the rainy season in Sudan unfolds, people will be harder to reach. "This will raise the death toll exponentially."

Yiddish Studies 2004-05

The Al and Malka Green Program in Yiddish Studies, housed in the Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures at the University of Toronto, is pleased to announce a new course for 2004-05:

Cultural History of East European Jews, 1800 – 2000
The course examines the history of the East European Jewish community through the eyes of literature, theatre, folklore, cinema and music productions. The texts include works by Hebrew, Yiddish, Russian and Polish-language writers and poets, scripts of Yiddish theatrical productions, paintings by Jewish artists, Yiddish-language films and lyrics of Hebrew and Yiddish songs created during the last two hundred years, all in English translation.
Taught Wednesdays, 10-12

We continue to offer courses in Elementary, Intermediate and Advanced Yiddish language. Contact the department for more information and for admissions advice.

Yet, by imposing conditions to ensure Al-Jazeera's compliance with Canadian broadcast standards, the CRTC "acknowledged that the concerns B'nai Brith raised in its submission are indeed warranted," B'nai Brith said.

In separate submissions to the CRTC a year ago, both CJC and B'nai Brith detailed instances in which Al-Jazeera broadcast anti-Semitic content, lionized suicide bombers as "martyrs" and denied the Holocaust took place.

CJC cited specific broadcasts in which Jews were referred to as "sons of apes and pigs;" "the most despicable people... worms... all evil;" "whoremongers" and enemies of Islam. Congress found several instances of Holocaust denial or trivialization, and regular diatribes against Israel.

In its 25-page ruling, the CRTC noted that one of the intervenors before the commission, the Canadian Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR-CAN), conceded that the reference to Jews as apes and pigs was broadcast, but that it was in the form of an e-mail from a viewer, and was aired years ago.

In fact, "most" of the statements provided by those opposed to the granting of a license to Al-Jazeera "were provided in isolation with almost no context in which to evaluate them," the CRTC said.

"Context, including cultural context, is particularly important given that the statements provided were translations from Arabic and, as such, may not have conveyed the full intent and meaning or the original words in the Arabic culture."

The CRTC noted that about 1,200 comments were filed in support of adding Al-Jazeera to cable listings, while more than 500 were filed in opposition and nine offered general remarks.

"Comments were generally very polarized," the commission said.

It also noted that both CJC and B'nai Brith had argued that approving Al-Jazeera and then pulling the plug if it contravened Canadian broadcast regulations was a poor solution.

> Onerous requirements de facto censorship, cable firms say

"The CJC submitted that this unsatisfactory solution, which has rarely been used by the commission in the past, would be tantamount to shutting the door after the proverbial horse has left the barn. Or in the words of B'nai Brith, once Al-Jazeera was placed on the digital lists, the 'genie would be out of the bottle.'"

Founded in 1996, Al-Jazeera is perhaps best known for broadcasting exclusive interviews with Osama bin Laden and for airing the Al Qaeda leader's taped threats against the West.

Sometimes referred to as the Arabic CNN, the 24-hour-a-day channel recently aired gruesome footage of hostages in Iraq shown being held or beheaded by their captors.

Earlier this month, Al-Jazeera issued a code of ethics, saying it would distinguish between news, analysis and commentary to avoid "falling into the trap of propaganda and speculation."

It also promised to "acknowledge any mistake as soon as it is made and take the initiative to correct it and avoid repeating it."

Canadian "grey market" subscribers to the U.S.-based DirecTV satellite service already receive Al-Jazeera, whose bureaus have been shut down in Jordan, Bahrain, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia because it has consistently sought out Israeli perspectives on Mideast issues.

CJC said it will work with the CRTC and Al-Jazeera distributors "to facilitate and ensure the conditions of licence are strictly adhered to."

B'nai Brith said it will examine its options and continue to monitor the situation. It pledged to "examine carefully all Arabic-language programming emanating from the Middle East, which is today the world's centre for the distribution of vile anti-Semitic materials."

B'nai Brith also called on the CRTC "to adopt an expedited process to deal with complaints and will examine all options to ensure that hate is not imported into Canada."

Hate posters found in downtown Ottawa

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Less than a month after the Beth Shalom West Synagogue was vandalized, a human rights lawyer has filed a complaint with the Ottawa Police hate crimes unit after spotting posters downtown that he described as "anti-Semitic."

Richard Warman said he found three different posters July 13 near the National Archives on Wellington Street, not far from Parliament Hill. Each one reads: "In Iraq Israel and the United Kingdom deliberately mislead the Americans into a never ending war."

The posters are the size of a piece of computer paper, and on one full-colour print there is an upside down U.S. flag with Stars of David and backward swastikas inside red stripes. In the corner, where 50 stars usually appear, is a large Star of David.

"I felt there was an association because of swastikas and the Star of David and thought that this should be investigated," Warman told The CJN.

Sgt. Ralph Heyerhoff of the hate crimes unit said police are investigating the posters but are treating them as an isolated incident, separate from the June shul attack in the former suburb of Nepean.

"There is no link between the two whatsoever," said Heyerhoff, adding that the posters contain confusing messages and police are still trying to figure out what they mean.

He said that "the swastikas on the synagogue were the right way around" and that by vandalizing the shul, the perpetrators were trying to send a clear message. "It appears to be different groups with different agendas."

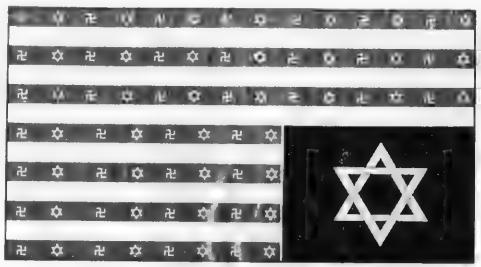
Rubin Friedman, community relations for the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, said his organization is very concerned about the latest incident. He agreed the messages are odd, largely because the swastikas are backward and blame Israel and the U.K. for the violence in Iraq.

"Someone clearly has an axe to grind against Great Britain," he said.

Warman said he's particularly concerned because someone put time and effort into making the posters using graphics and computer imaging.

"These things are the tip of the iceberg," he said. "If you pay attention in the form of posters, [you are] not going to have Molotov cocktails going through the windows."

A spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa said it was aware the posters existed, but refused to comment further.



In Iraq
Israel and the United Kingdom deliberately mislead the Americans into a never ending war.

Police are investigating three posters found near Parliament Hill.

Canada's abstention on UN fence resolution disappoints CIC

Fogel acknowledged Canada was uncomfortable with the court's intrusion into the question of the legitimacy of the barrier, most of which has yet to be built.

Canada abstained in the last UN General Assembly vote on the fence, on Dec. 8, 2003. That resolution, also sponsored by the Palestinian delegation, asked the ICJ to rule on the fence's legality.

Fogel, echoing the official view of the Israeli government, said the fence is a temporary measure to prevent terrorism, and its route beyond the Green Line in the West Bank stems from security and strategic considerations.

Reynald Doiron, a spokesperson in Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, said Canada has been consistent in its position on the fence.

"There is no change of policy on this issue. As you know, in December, we expressed strong reservations about taking this issue to the International Court of Justice. We didn't think it was the appropriate course to take then, and we don't think it is the appropriate course to take now. So that is why we abstained, basically."

He added: "We do believe that Israel has its preoccupations of security, and it is not taken into account sufficiently in the present process. We want to help everything that contributes to the peace process in the Middle East and not work on anything that is weakening [it]."

In an official statement, the Department of Foreign Affairs said: "Canada remains concerned with the highly prejudicial impact the barrier may have on prospects for peace. The barrier's adverse effect on the ever more dire humanitarian and socio-economic situation of the Palestinian population in the Occupied Territories is troubling. Although Israel has a right and a duty to protect its citizens, measures taken in this regard must be consistent with the applicable international humanitarian law, which is binding on all parties to the [Arab-Israeli] conflict.

"While we have serious concerns regarding the route of the barrier, the issue of the barrier cannot be viewed in isolation from Israel's security concerns. As the court itself maintained, Israel has the right to take necessary measures to protect the security of its citizens and its borders from attacks by Palestinian terrorist groups… but must do so in accordance with international law…

"The resolution does not adequately reflect this reality… we do not believe that this resolution, which seeks to implement the Court's opinion as if it were a binding decision instead of an advisory opinion, and which does not adequately reflect the current situation of the larger conflict, will help advance the cause of peace.

"For these reasons, Canada has chosen to abstain on the resolution."

After the UN vote, Israel vowed to press on with constructing the fence.

"Israel will not stop building it or abdicate its inalienable right to self-defence," said Ra'anan Gissin, one of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's senior advisors.

Dan Gillerman, Israel's UN representative, also struck a defiant note. "Thank God that the fate of Israel and of the Jewish people is not decided in this hall."

Describing the resolution as "magnificent," Nasser al-Kidwa, the Palestinian observer at the UN, said he would now urge the Security Council to pass a binding resolution.

Last October, the United States vetoed a Security Council resolution condemning the fence.

According to the Canada-Israel Committee, Canada has a record of abstaining on UN resolutions.

Last year, Canada supported 15 Israel-related resolutions and abstained on the remaining five.

Canada's position is unsatisfactory, according to David Goldberg, CIC research director. Writing in The CJN about a resolution on Palestinian children, he observed:"It reflects Ottawa's practice of applying a moral equivalency between Palestinian terrorist atrocities on the one hand and Israeli defensive measures on the other hand."

Please see commentaries on the fence on pages 8, 9, 11 and 12.

Cotler, who unveiled the plan during the recent federal election campaign, said anti-hate provisions can be found in constitutional, criminal, administrative and international law and, unless they specialize in the area, jurists often do not have these tools readily at hand.

First appointed to the cabinet last December by Prime Minister Paul Martin, Cotler said he expects to encounter more challenges from the opposition on such contentious proposed legislation as same-sex marriage and the decriminalization of possession of small amounts of marijuana. He is hoping a "consensus" can be found on these issues.

"A minority government means our priorities have to be clearly defined," he said. "But there are broad-based policy initiatives that can find support. I don't expect to be frustrated."

It is not widely known, he said, but much of his work involves more than drawing up legislation.

"Perhaps the most important [aspect] is judicial appointments. These appointments are extremely crucial and can affect the administration of justice for a generation," he said.

Cotler will also be preparing the government's interventions before the courts, acting, in essence, as legal advisor to the Crown.

The other Jewish cabinet minister from Quebec, Jacques Saada, is now minister of economic development for the regions of Quebec and minister responsible for the Francophonie. The Brossard-La Prairie MP had been House leader and minister responsible for democratic reform in Martin's first cabinet.

In this new role, Saada will be at the helm of the government's plan to spend an extra $2 billion over the next five years on the economic development of Quebec, outside the Montreal area. Saada is the only one of the eight ministers from Quebec whose riding is not on the Island of Montreal.

Saada said he is pleased with his new role. "To participate in the front line of Quebec's development is extremely stimulating. It will give me an opportunity to deepen my knowledge of Quebec and to better represent the province in the cabinet."

The Tunisian-born, French-raised Saada is also excited about being involved with the Francophonie. "This is an area that I have dreamed of taking part in for a long time. I have always been passionate about the international arena, and now I have the chance to put this into practice. This is extremely precious to me."

The third Jewish member of the cabinet is Jack Austin of Vancouver, who returns as leader of the government in the Senate.

With a minority government, Austin's responsibilities of planning and managing the government's legislative program in the upper house will take on more importance. He must maintain relations with the Opposition on all matters concerning Senate activities. He will work with new House leader Tony Valeri in getting legislation through Parliament, which in a minority situation means negotiating with the other parties.

Five generations of Wagman family gather for reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More than 400 people representing five generations of Ruchel and Isaac Wagman's descendants gathered earlier this month in Chicago for the latest in a series of reunions held every four years in a different city.

"It has now been 20 years since the first international reunion of the family," said Toronto's Mel Katzman, who chaired the 1996 Wagman reunion.

He said he is pleased to see the torch passed to an enthusiastic fifth generation, many of whom will be working on organizing the next reunion in Toronto – the family's sixth – in 2008.

"It was amazing," Katzman said of the recent four-day event. "I walked into the dining room of the hotel in Chicago and I was greeted by hundreds of family from across Canada, the United States, Israel, Africa, China, Argentina and Brazil. It is impossible to describe the feeling unless one experiences the emotion of that moment."

Ruchel and Isaac Wagman (Wegman) were born in Bogoria, Poland, a shtetl 150 kilometres south of Warsaw. They married in 1861 and operated a bakery and general store. After the Kishinev pogrom in 1895 and the institution of repressive measures by the Russian government of the time, the Wagman children and their families began immigrating to North America, and when they were established, they brought others.

Anne Picov told The CJN that 1,500 Wagman descendants have been identified, and of those, 900 are living.

"At the reunion, the youngest relative was five days old and the oldest was 89," Picov said.

"It is exciting and very uplifting to be with so many relatives in one place… [there is a] wonderful feeling and warmth we have at these reunions."

At the reunion, family members unveiled a family history in the form of a 127-page book. There was also a slide show and an elaborate family tree, and recently the family, which calls itself the Ruchel Isaac Cousins' Club, designed a website with links to family information and photos.

"Our distant cousins have become close family and friends," Katzman said. "We call each other throughout the year and share our joys and adversities. The ruach and the glow of the memories these reunions create will be with all of us forever."

To mark each reunion, family members make charitable contributions to the communities that have given them a good life. This year, the Chicago cousins held a family blood donor drive, while the Toronto cousins donated $10,000 to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Universities revisit Israel study policies

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto has lifted a two-year restriction on undergraduate students wishing to study in Israel, and the University of Western Ontario is reassessing restrictions on funding for study at Hebrew University that have also been in place for the past two years.

U of T's policy of neither promoting nor endorsing study in Israel was based on travel advisories issued by Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, said Miranda Cheng, director of the school's international student exchange office.

It was prompted by concerns for students' safety, not anti-Israel sentiment, she said. As a comparable example, she noted that U of T cancelled a 2003 summer program in Hong Kong – affecting more than 300 students – because of a travel ban imposed by the World Health Organization.

Restrictions are different for graduate students, who may need to travel during "key times" for their research, she said.

She said that almost a dozen U of T students will be attending Hebrew University in the 2004-2005 year, while Tel Aviv University (TAU), Technion, and Haifa University will each host a U of T student.

"I'm incredibly happy that we have a large group going to Israel in '04-'05, and representing very different disciplines, and very happy that we have a number of students coming from Israel," she added, referring to exchange programs with U of T partners at TAU and Technion.

Merle Goldman, director of national programs and academic affairs for Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, said there are more than 60 Canadian students, graduate and undergraduate, scheduled to attend the Israeli institution this year. "We're pretty well back to where we were a few years ago."

In addition to U of T, the students are from York University, the University of Waterloo, Western, Queen's University, McGill University, the University of Manitoba and the University of Winnipeg.

"We encourage students to engage in study abroad," said Kathleen Kevany, director of Western's Centre for New and Exchange Students. "The challenge we faced was when there was money involved. There was some question about whether the university was giving its endorsement [by releasing funds]."

In the case of exchange programs, Western assesses the safety of a country, but if a student decides independently to study elsewhere, "we haven't said, 'Go,' and we don't say, 'Don't go.'"

The university does provide "letters of permission" saying only that a course is academically equivalent, Kevany said.

At least one Canadian university will not provide such letters until the students return, said Orna Benayon, academic affairs director of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

York University, which has more than a dozen students going to Israeli universities this year, has never had restrictions, said Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

"My feeling is that students are adults," he said. "There are many decisions they make about what type of risks they will take."

York rescinds suspension of pro-Palestinian student

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

York University has decided to allow Daniel Freeman-Maloy, a suspended York student and pro-Palestinian activist, to return to school in the fall.

This comes after Superior Court Justice Gloria Epstein ruled that a judicial review of Freeman-Maloy's suspension could proceed.

"We reflected on the matter and believe we've made our point," York spokesperson Nancy White said of the school's decision. "We wanted to give the student a second chance and we hope the young man will take that chance."

Freeman-Maloy, 22, was suspended for three years last April after taking part in two protests in an unauthorized area of campus and using a megaphone, which is prohibited at York.

Last March, after one of the protests, York temporarily suspended the club privileges of a pro-Palestinian group and two Jewish groups, including Hillel.

York president Lorna Marsden suspended Freeman-Maloy, who is Jewish, using a York regulation that did not require her to grant him a hearing or appeal.

Once the case had already gone to court, she agreed to hear his appeal at a full internal discipline tribunal, which Epstein declared to be inadequate for this situation.

Freeman-Maloy has announced he will pursue a lawsuit against Marsden.

White said the suspension sends a strong message to other students.

"I think we will continue to be very clear in standing behind our message that we are against threats and confrontations and hold everyone accountable to our code of conduct," she said.

White added that it is important for students to understand that York "fully supports freedom of expression and debate on campus," but is "against violence, threats and confrontations."

Talia Klein, director of Hillel at York, said she is happy to see the issue being resolved, although Hillel was not involved in the case.

Richler makes 'natural transition' to head of Congress' Ontario branch

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As far as lawyer Joel Richler is concerned, switching from his former role as litigator for Canadian Jewish Congress to his current position as chair of the organization's Ontario wing is merely a "natural transition."

In his capacity as legal counsel for Congress, Richler was handed some high profile cases. In one, he urged a Canadian Human Rights tribunal to shut down the website operated by the notorious anti-Semite, Ernst Zundel. He also represented Congress at the New Brunswick Human Rights Commission in the Malcolm Ross case, arguing the case in the end in the Supreme Court of Canada, and he's handled various "odds and sods" along the way.

Considering that Ontario is experiencing a nasty resurgence of anti-Semitism, he takes the reins at a time when his legal skills and advocacy abilities will be put to the test.

> Legal skills and advocacy abilities will be put to the test

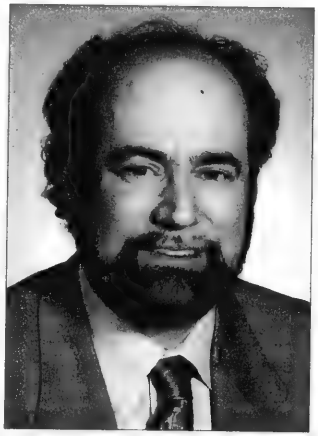
Richler, a senior litigator with Blake, Cassels & Graydon LLP, says "two obvious issues" come to mind when considering his agenda at Congress: contemporary anti-Semitism and school funding.

As the federation-linked community's primary advocacy agency charged with countering hatred of Jews, Congress has a key role to play in addressing manifestations of contemporary anti-Semitism, which should be distinguished from "old fashioned, right wing anti-semitism," Richler said.

"We can make sure that the community's concerns regarding anti-Semitism are brought to the attention of the appropriate authorities," he said. In addition, he intends to maintain Congress' contacts with other community groups that share its anti-racist and human rights agendas.

A rally organized in part by Congress, held in late March after a Jewish cemetery was vandalized and homes and a synagogue were defaced with Nazi symbols, was attended by political figures from all major parties, as well as leaders from a number of communities, he noted.

Richler pointed to CJC's good relations with Islamic groups, whose representatives attended the March rally against anti-Semitism. He also noted that Congress stood with the Muslim community when a mosque was attacked, and that "we have good relations with other communities."



Joel Richler

With the formation of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), a co-ordinating agency created late in the term of Ed Morgan, Richler's predecessor as chair of Congress' Ontario region, CJC's exact role in advocacy is somewhat vague.

"It's in a state of flux," Richler acknowledged. "No one's sure of the precise organizational structure."

Nevertheless, Richler plans to maintain good relations with CIJA, which sets the operating budgets for the community's various advocacy agencies, while forging ahead with his broad policy goals.

"No one has suggested to us that Congress' role will be lessened," he said.

As for CJC's budget, given the demands on the organization and the rising incidence of anti-Semitism, "I don't expect to get less," he said. "We have every indication it will get adequate funding for its functions."

School funding, the second major item on his agenda, "is not an issue that's going to go away," Richler said.

Upon taking office last year, the new provincial Liberal government immediately repealed the education tax credit put in place by the outgoing Tories. Richler promised that Congress "will make the government aware of how disappointed the community is" about the move.

As to a specific proposal Congress might advance to replace the tax credit, Richler said announcing that would be premature.

"There might be other alternatives, as in other provinces," he said.

Human chain protests disengagement plan

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — They've already spoken out against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza withdrawal plan. Last weekend, they took their battle to the streets.

Joining hands in a human chain that stretched from the Gaza Strip to Jerusalem, some 130,000 protesters – both young and old, from the political fringes and from the mainstream – gathered on Sunday to send Sharon the clearest message of dissent yet from a camp he long considered his own.

And although the chain was peaceful, its timing – amid Shin Bet warnings of growing anger among radical Jews at Sharon's plan to disengage from the Palestinian territories – appeared likely to unnerve the government.

"I think what is happening today is a message by the real, beautiful Israel to those people in mainstream Israel who have lost their will to fight, and therefore I came to say thank you to the wonderful people of Gush Katif," said demonstrator Kfir Shachar of Rishon Lezion, referring to the main Gaza settlement bloc.

In a grim twist, Palestinian terrorists wounded six Israeli children and a soldier in two separate attacks Sunday on Gush Katif, demonstrating the vulnerability of the heavily fortified enclaves.

Sharon, who has vowed to remove all 8,100 Gaza settlers in 2005 under his disengagement plan, did not immediately comment on the demonstration.

But in a cabinet briefing leaked to the media, the head of military intelligence gave a boost to the unilateral plan that has caused a rift so deep in Israel's right-wing camp as to pit Sharon against fellow senior members of the ruling Likud Party, including Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"Disengagement will be beneficial in terms of containing Palestinian terrorism and even raising the chances of restarting peace negotiations," Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi-Farkash was quoted as telling cabinet ministers.

A longtime Sharon confidant, Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin, cast the human-chain demonstration as a show of pride by settlers, rather than a show of political force.

"I see this as a matter of solidarity rather than a protest, by a community of pioneers that long did the country's bidding and has recently been subjected to a process of delegitimation," Rivlin told reporters at the Western Wall, as shofars were sounded and psalms read to signal the end of the demonstration.

But some assessments of the dissent from Jerusalem were less rosy.

Internal Security Minister Tzachi Hanegbi noted mounting concern at the possibility of a groundswell of targeted attacks on Palestinians by far-right Jews.

"The threat level against the Temple Mount by Jewish extremists and fanatics in order to disrupt the entire peace process has risen in the past few months, and especially in the last few weeks, more than ever before," Hanegbi told Israel's Channel Two television in an interview broadcast Saturday.

Other media said Jews could go so far as ramming an airplane, a la Al-Qaeda, into the two Muslim shrines on the Temple Mount in hopes of sparking an Arab jihad against Israel that would sweep away the disengagement plan.

But Hanegbi said the Shin Bet had no hard evidence against any specific suspects, prompting members of Israel's right-wing to accuse him of needlessly alarming the Israeli public.

Holocaust restitution to be centralized

By URIEL HEILMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Was it a revolution or a resolution? After a stormy few weeks leading up to last week's annual board meeting of the Claims Conference, the main group charged with Holocaust restitution, an agreement was reached to centralize world Jewry's restitution efforts.

"Instead of sitting here and fighting about the pie, let's go out and get a bigger pie," Amir Shaviv, assistant executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), said. The JDC is a member of the Claims Conference.

The meeting may also have quelled – for the time being – the controversy surrounding the distribution of unclaimed funds left from the $1.25-billion Swiss banks settlement. A presentation by Claims Conference officials showed there may be no funds left once all claims have been resolved.

That assessment may render moot or at least defer the debate over who should get the leftover money.

Depending on whom one talks to, the agreement on centralizing restitution either marked a historic revolution against Claims Conference control or resolved criticism against the restitution group and signalled that the organization is more influential than ever.

For now, both sides are claiming victory.

On July 22, toward the end of the two-day meeting in New York, board members approved a resolution to create a panel to "discuss coordination of restitution efforts outside Germany and Austria" that "should include the participation of all relevant groups involved in the restitution of funds."

It was not immediately clear which groups would be included outside of the Claims Conference and the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO). The Claims Conference deals with Germany and Austria, while the WJRO is charged with securing restitution elsewhere.

Critics have charged that the Claims Conference, created in 1951 to press Jewish material claims against Germany, is not sufficiently representative of today's Jewish world and does too much of its work behind closed doors.

One of the conference's most vocal critics, Elan Steinberg, executive vice-president of the World Jewish Congress and a Claims Conference board member, said the new resolution would open the restitution process to the entire Jewish world.

The Claims Conference's chairman, Julius Berman, said the decision to create the panel is a sign that Jewish groups want to make use of the group's expertise in seeking restitution from other European countries involved in the Holocaust.

The WJRO has had limited success in getting eastern European countries to return Jewish assets, seized by the Nazis or their allies.

Bobby Brown, senior adviser on Holocaust-era property at the Jewish Agency for Israel, said the resolution would result in "the first real and open discussion on the restitution issue that has taken place since the early 1950s."

Part of the impetus for creating a panel to centralize restitution efforts arose out of the divisiveness engendered by the distribution of unclaimed funds from the 1998 Swiss banks settlement.

On June 10, the Claims Conference reached an agreement with the U.S. District Court and Swiss banks to publish an additional 5,000 names of Holocaust-era Swiss account owners, allow the Claims Conference limited access to search certain bank records and check Jewish claimants against records of 4.1 million Swiss bank accounts.

That deal, which still needs Swiss government approval, could use up all the money in the settlement because it would find more account holders, conference officials said.

Tel Aviv judge murdered

A 49-year-old Tel Aviv District Court judge was killed in a drive-by shooting last week in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Hasharon, marking the first judicial assassination in Israel's history. Judge Adi Azar was shot at point-blank range from a motorcycle on Hatzorfim Street, outside his home. The assailant escaped. "I am shocked to the depths of my soul… this must give us food for thought about where Israel's society is headed," said Justice Minister Yosef Lapid. Though the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade claimed responsibility, police aren't ruling out other motives in the case.

Israel expresses displeasure

Opposition leader Shimon Peres told visiting European Union envoy Javier Solana that the EU must sever all ties with the Palestinians unless changes are made to the Palestinian Authority, Israel Radio reported. Peres was meeting with the EU's Mideast envoy in Tel Aviv at the end of his two-day visit, in which Israeli officials made clear their displeasure over the EU vote in favour of a UN resolution against Israel's separation barrier.

Al Qaeda targeted Israel too

According to the report by the U.S. Sept. 11 commission, a high-ranking Al Qaeda operations official, Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, currently in U.S. custody, admitted during questioning that the terror group was also planning to attack Israel as well as Jewish targets in New York. During the summer of 2001, the report said, Sheikh Mohammed proposed to Al Qaeda leader Osama Bin Laden that they try to recruit a Saudi air force pilot to use a Saudi combat plane in an air attack on Eilat. The report also details an attempt by Israeli passenger Daniel Lewin to stop the hijackers from entering the cockpit of one of the two planes flown into the World Trade Center.

Iran nukes loom

Israeli intelligence believes Iran will have nuclear weapons by 2007. The projection was made by intelligence chiefs in a report to cabinet ministers, Israel Radio said. Recent U.S. assessments have predicted Iran's atomic program will produce nuclear arms by the end of the decade. The intelligence chiefs also warned that missiles held by Syria and Hezbollah pose a serious threat to Israel.

Close call a 'miracle'

A rocket launched from Gaza hit an Israeli home but failed to explode. The Qassam rocket, fired by Hamas terrorists, reached a kibbutz in the western Negev Desert, landing in a family's bedroom. The homeowner and three of her children were in the room but escaped unscathed as the homemade rocket's warhead apparently was damaged while penetrating the roof. "This is simply a miracle," said Israeli district police chief Yaki Artzi. Authorities withheld the name of the kibbutz to avoid giving Hamas a gauge of the rocket's accuracy.

A chance for a Mideast breakthrough?

Analysis

Few doubt that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan has the potential to become a watershed event in Middle Eastern politics, and it already is causing major upheavals in both internal Israeli and Palestinian politics.

Sharon is being forced to widen his coalition to ensure a parliamentary and cabinet majority for the plan, while on the Palestinian side, the impending Israeli pullout from Gaza has triggered an unprecedented challenge to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's authority, as well as demands for a new style of governance.

It's not yet clear what kind of coalition Sharon will form, nor how the violence and confusion among the Palestinians will play out. But if Sharon is able to build a strong coalition and if a new, more pragmatic Palestinian government emerges from the present chaos, the current turmoil could be a prelude to a significant breakthrough in Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Sharon's coalition negotiations, though, are going to be very tricky. Given the widespread opposition in his own Likud Party to the plan for Israeli disengagement from the Palestinians, Sharon needs to bring in the pro-disengagement Labor Party to ensure approval for his plan in cabinet and the Knesset.

Ideally, Sharon would like to build a secular coalition with center-right Likud, center-left Labor and the centrist Shinui Party, which would command more than 70 seats in the 120-seat Knesset and agree on a disengagement agenda.

But Sharon's Likud opponents argue that such a coalition would lead to policies too accommodating toward the Palestinians and a dilution of Likud's conservative economic policy, which is pulling Israel out of recession.

Worse, they maintain, if Sharon forms a coalition with only Likud, Labor and Shinui, it will be perceived as too middle-class and Ashkenazi, and the Likud would lose at least half its working-class, Sephardi constituency in the next elections.

"We would drop from 40 to around 20 Knesset seats," says Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, who is considered a political savant in the Likud.

But Shalom is part of the problem: He's concerned that if Labor joins the government, he might lose the Foreign Ministry to Labor leader Shimon Peres.

So far, Sharon is not making any promises, but he will be very wary of taking on Shalom in the Likud Central Committee. The foreign minister wields tremendous clout in that forum, which he intended to display at a huge rally that was to be held July 25.

Moreover, Shalom is hinting he's ready to form an alliance with his nemesis, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, if he feels Sharon isn't treating him right. Such an alliance could seriously threaten Sharon's hold on power in the party and the government, if the policy and personal differences lead to a showdown.

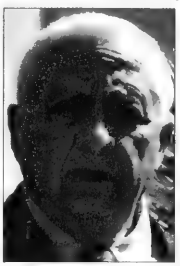
That's why Sharon has been forced into coalition talks with two Orthodox parties, the Ashkenazi United Torah Judaism bloc and the Sephardi Shas Party. Together, they have 16 MKs and could replace Shinui – which now has 14 seats – to form a stable government with Likud and Labor.

That would allow Sharon to be generous to Labor with Shinui's portfolios. As well, Peres could be given a special peace portfolio rather than the Foreign Ministry, and Likud would be able to keep its working-class voters.

But that would be less than ideal for Sharon. The Orthodox parties, which lean to the right, could undermine the disengagement plan or threaten to undermine it unless they get concessions on religious issues or bigger budgets for religious institutions.

Sharon would like to see Orthodox parties balanced by the staunchly secular Shinui, but each side refuses to sit in a coalition with the other.

Shinui's leader, Justice Minister Yosef "Tommy" Lapid, is livid with Labor for its willingness to serve in a government that includes Orthodox parties but not Shinui. He warns that if Labor joins such a coalition, it will be signing its death warrant, because Shinui in opposition would capture most of Labor's traditional support.



Ariel Sharon

"If Labor joins a government with the [haredim], we will give it a donkey's burial," Lapid declared.

Some Labor leaders, such as Haim Ramon, are still trying get Shinui into the coalition as part of a longer term political vision. Ramon sees a Likud-Labor-Shinui coalition burgeoning into a new centrist party that could dominate Israeli politics for years to come.

To get more support for a coalition with Labor and Shinui, with or without the Orthodox parties, Sharon is warning Likud rebels that if they don't support him, the inevitable result will be new elections, which could cost many of them their Knesset seats.

To solve the Shalom problem, pundits believe Sharon will leave him at the Foreign Ministry and offer Peres, in addition to the special portfolio, a "forum-of-two" mechanism, whereby the two elder statesmen would make key decisions together, regardless of whether Shinui, the Orthodox parties or both wind up in the coalition.

Sharon and Peres, however, take very different views of the current chaos on the Palestinian side. Sharon says the chaos highlights the fact there is no Palestinian partner and that Israel has no choice but to take unilateral action.

Peres says the chaos shows the danger of pulling out of Gaza without talking to Palestinians in a position to maintain law and order afterward.

Israeli intelligence analysts say it's too early to count out Arafat, despite the unprecedentedly overt criticism of him and his regime by Palestinians.

But if the voices of reform are able to enforce law and order by reforming the Palestinians' myriad armed forces, or if they can force Arafat to do so, a new chapter in Israeli-Palestinian relations could open.

Israel has virtually won the intifadah war, and more and more Palestinians are questioning its rationale and acknowledging its failure to bring any political gains. Indeed, this sense of failure is the mainspring behind the growing criticism of Arafat.

The question now is whether Sharon, by building a new coalition and pushing his disengagement plan through, can turn Israel's advantage on the ground into political coin.

Israel & the Jewish World

No place like home

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Since first making aliyah in July 1990, ex-Hamiltonian Josh Schwartz has come a long way.

Currently the director general of the Jewish Agency, Schwartz, 34, has had a 14-year Israel experience marked by extraordinary professional success.

Canadian olim

His adventure started after he completed his undergraduate studies in political science at McMaster University.

Having previously completed a one-year exchange program at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, he took a job as a counsellor for Canadian youth on a kibbutz summer program run by Canada-Israel Experience.

Josh Schwartz

"I woke up one day on the kibbutz and I went directly to the Ministry of Interior in Jerusalem and said I wanted to change my status," recalls Schwartz, who had already opened his aliyah file at the Jewish Agency office in Toronto.

"I just wanted to stay in Israel. I couldn't wait to go back to Canada to make aliyah from there."

Shwartz says his passion for Israel derived at least partly from growing up in Hamilton, where despite his participation in the city's relatively strong 5,000-member Jewish community, he still felt something was missing.

"Perhaps one of the reasons why I decided to make aliyah is that I grew up and went to university in such a non-Jewish environment," he says. "Had I grown up in North York or Forest Hill and went to [the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto], I would probably be in Toronto right now.

"In Canada, I never had any real problems, but… I never felt like I belonged 100 per cent."

Hebrew U's one-year exchange program was another key motivator.

"There is no question about it, I decided to move here when I came on the one-year program," he says.

"I spent a year here living with Israelis and Jews from around the world, and I enjoyed every single minute of it. It wasn't like being in Canada, where there were good days and bad days. Every single day [in Israel] was fun, from morning to night. So, I asked myself, 'Why do I want to go back?'"

But after about a year of living in Israel, Schwartz decided to do just that.

"I realized I wasn't ready to live in Israel yet," he says, because the challenges of leaving his family and finding his own way as a new immigrant were much greater than he anticipated.

And, he adds, "I wanted to go back to school."

After first completing his master's degree in international affairs at Columbia University in New York, Schwartz returned to Canada, where he worked for a year in Toronto as the Ontario regional director of human rights for B'nai Brith Canada.

He says the Jewish communities in both Toronto and New York were tempting alternatives to living in Israel.

"When I was at Columbia, which is 60 per cent Jewish, all of my friends were Jewish, and I almost stayed in New York because it was a very fulfilling Jewish life," he said.

The biggest temptation was to enrol in Columbia's PhD program in Islamic history, to which he was accepted.

"But, in the end, I knew that if I stayed, I would never get to Israel."

So Schwartz returned to Israel in 1994, and that's when his Zionist adventure really got underway.

"I got off the plane and within a week I found an apartment, and within 10 days I had a job."

His first position was as researcher/director of public affairs for Peace Watch, an NGO co-founded by politician Natan Sharansky with the approval of the Israeli Foreign Ministry whose mandate was to monitor Palestinian and Israeli violations of the Oslo peace process.

During his two-year stint with Peace Watch, Schwartz served as an observer of the Palestinian elections, and in that capacity he was invited to lecture to groups from abroad that were visiting Israel through the Jewish Agency.

"I started doing a lot of lectures," he says, explaining that he would give the groups a two-hour talk about the peace process. "I actually started taking groups to the territories, to Hebron and other places, mostly those on one-year programs through the Jewish Agency."

In the meantime, having completed his shortened army service in a combat unit, Schwartz moved up the ranks in the Israel Defence Forces to become a reserve lieutenant in the IDF Spokesman's Office.

Says Schwartz, "The army was challenging, eye-opening and fun."

Perhaps equally challenging and fun was his next job as a full-time lecturer for the Jewish Agency, which created the position for him in 1996.

In 1998, a year after the Jewish Agency inaugurated its new education department, the director general of the new unit brought Schwartz on board as his advisor.

When Sallai Meridor was elected chairman of the Jewish Agency in 1999, he asked Schwartz to be his advisor. He accepted and worked with Meridor for the next two years.

"The biggest challenge has been working with Sallai," says Shwartz. "He is brilliant and hard-working, and he is an incredible person. Keeping up with him is a full-time job."

In 2001, Schwartz was appointed director general of the Jewish Agency and, "The rest is history," he says.

"I love working in this country. Israel is where I belong. I feel like I'm at home here. I feel like this country belongs to me."

N.A. aliyah increases

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — More than 1,100 North American Jews are expected to immigrate to Israel this summer.

As well, more than 1,800 North Americans will have immigrated to Israel from January to September of this year, a 20 per cent increase compared to the same period in 2003, the Jewish Agency said.

"This year we estimate seeing the highest number of olim from North America in 15 years," said Michael Landsberg, executive director of the agency's North American aliyah delegation.

Two Canadians among bidders for Israel Discount Bank

By SHLOMI SHEFFER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Canadians are leading two of five foreign bids vying to buy majority ownership in the state-controlled Israel Discount Bank, the country's third largest.

One bid is headed by New York-based Matthew Bronfman, the brother of Edgar Bronfman Jr., whose family once ran the now-defunct Seagram liquor empire of Montreal, while another is led by Gerald Schwartz, chairman and CEO of Toronto-based Onex Corp.

Gerald Schwartz

Last Thursday was the deadline for bids. The state holds a 57 per cent stake, which it has made several unsuccessful attempts to unload, and intends to sell 51 per cent of the bank.

Schwartz, 62, failed in previous bids to take control of Air Canada and Labatt Breweries. Onex employs 90,000 people worldwide, and has assets of $14 billion (Cdn). Schwartz owns 17 per cent of the firm and most of the voting rights.

Bronfman is a partner with Dudi Weismann in the energy group Alon-Dor, which also owns the Blue Square supermarket chain. The Bronfman family has long been linked to prominent Jewish causes.

A third bid is headed by New Jersey entrepreneur Daniel Strauss, who made his fortune running old-age homes in the United States, while two other unexpected contenders submitted bids at the last moment, including one represented by the Rothschild investment bank, owned by the legendary family.

The bids are "an expression of faith by foreign investors in the Israeli economy," said Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"The bank's privatization will march forward, accelerate the process of increasing competitiveness in the Israeli banking system, which will lead to lower fees for customers and cheaper credit for businesses."

The sell-off process is expected to last six months.

After three straight years of losses, the bank returned to profitability last year with earnings of 168 million NIS ($49 million Cdn). Analysts are forecasting a profit of 492 million NIS ($86 million Cdn) this year, a 175 per cent increase. The bank is said to be worth 6.5 billion NIS ($1.9 billion Cdn).

Gitai's Alila offers a glimpse of life in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Alila, Amos Gitai's latest film, unfolds in a dilapidated Tel Aviv neighbourhood against the backdrop of lust, jealousy, patriotism and Palestinian suicide bombings.

It's quite an explosive mixture and Gitai, one of Israel's most accomplished directors, usually juggles these disparate themes with panache.

Adapted from a novel by Yehoshua Kenaz, Alila, scheduled to open at the Carlton Cinemas on July 30, is composed of a series of interlocking vignettes that shed light on nearly 12 distinct characters.

Ezra (Uri Klausner), a divorced building contractor, is having an intense conversation with his teenaged son, Eyal (Amit Mestechkin), as this gritty film opens.

For reasons only known to himself, Eyal does not want to serve in the army. Eyal's position is a source of deep disappointment to Ezra, a patriot who believes the country has lost its idealism.

"It's not the way it used to be," he says, echoing a fairly common lament heard in certain Israeli circles these days.

As father and son talk, Ezra stops his car to hire several itinerant Chinese workers to finish repairs at an apartment building in the centre of the city.

This scene enables Gitai to focus attention on a fairly new social and economic phenomenon in Israel – the influx of foreign workers.

Shifting gears once more, Gitai introduces us to Hezi (Amos Lavie), a husky middle-aged man who has rented one of the flats in the building for secret trysts with Gabi (Yael Abecassis), a younger, self-deprecating woman.

She and Hezi engage in such loud and vigorous sex that some of the neighbours complain.

Schwartz (Yosef Carmon), a tenant in the building and a Holocaust survivor still tormented by his horrific experiences, is one of the complainers whose normally peaceful existence is being disrupted by the passionate lovers next door.

Schwartz's Filipino caregiver Linda (Lyn Shiao Zamir), who gives him his medication and provides him with a measure of company, blithely drowns out the news on the radio of the latest suicide bombing by playing music from the Philippines.

Rounding out the cast is Mali (Hanna Laslo), Ezra's ex-wife, who maintains a steamy romantic relationship with Ilan (Liron Levo), a man considerably younger than herself.

Although Ezra is gnawingly jealous of Ilan, he enlists his help in a desperate search for Eyal, who has disappeared and gone AWOL from the army.

Not every character in Alila is particularly compelling, but taken as a whole, they tend to rivet a viewer.

In Alila, Gitai offers a raw, unfiltered glimpse of life in one grimy corner of contemporary Israel.

Omar Sharif shines in Monsieur Ibrahim

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two exciting new films have just arrived in video stores everywhere: Broken Wings and Monsieur Ibrahim.

Broken Wings is the best film to come out of Israel in some time. It is a beautifully nuanced film about a family tragedy and how that event touched the lives of each member of that family.

It is the extraordinarily moving story of the very ordinary Ullman family. The father died suddenly, leaving his wife, Dafna, and their four children trying to cope with the after effects. Each family member deals with the loss in his or her own particular way.

After nine months of mourning, Dafna returns to her job as a midwife at a local hospital. The 16- year-old son, Yair, quits school and hides from life inside a mouse costume. The 11- year old son, Ido, jumps into an empty swimming pool in an effort to set the world free jump record, while the six-year-old daughter, Bahr, begins her first day of school with nervous anticipation.

That leaves it up to the oldest child, 17- year-old Maya, a gifted and upcoming singer/songwriter, to look after her younger siblings while trying to break into the Israeli music industry.

Frequently these two goals conflict and Maya's dreams are in danger of getting lost in the family shuffle.

Everyone is left to their own devices to get through each day, as obstacles spring up at every turn. Then Maya forgets to pick her younger sister up from school and her brother, Ido, is injured while jumping into the pool. This shakes the entire family out of its lethargy and finally galvanizes each of them into action, forcing a unity onto the family that vindicates one's belief in familial cohesiveness and love.

Told with sincerity, drama and humour, this film has a universality rarely matched in an Israeli film.

Broken Wings is director Nir Bergman's first feature film and features renowned Israeli stage actress Orli Zilberschatz-Banai as the mother, Dafna Ullman; newcomer Maya Maron as the oldest child Maya; Nitai Gvirtz as Yair; Daniel Magon as Ido; and Eliana Magon as Bahr.

Monsieur Ibrahim is a French film that won a lot of attention when it was released theatrically earlier this year because of its message of peace and brotherhood between Muslims and Jews. It is an important film at a time when the western world has seen a steep rise in anti-Semitism, especially in countries such as France.

The film's star, Omar Sharif. has aged over the past 40 years, but his acting abilities have improved. Although he tends to ham it up at times, this is one of the best performances of his career.

Monsieur Ibrahim is set in the 1960s, in a poor section of Paris. Moses is a young Jewish adolescent living in a rundown apartment with a father who has difficulty supporting the family and a mother and older brother who have both run away from the depressing living conditions. Eventually, the father also flees and winds up commiting suicide.

Moses, called Momo in the film, turns to the neighbourhood grocer, Monsieur Ibrahim, an elderly Muslim widower who believes the answer to all problems can be found in the Koran.

M. Ibrahim adopts the boy and the two of them live together in peace and harmony, thus showing that a Muslim and a Jew can live together.

But all is not that simple and Momo adds an element of adventure to M. Ibrahim's life. As a result, they go off together in a red convertible to drive across Europe to visit M. Ibrahim's home town in Turkey.

While the story is heartwarming and leaves the viewer with some pleasant feelings, there are a lot of unanswered questions and many holes in the story. But it is definitely worth seeing, if only for Sharif's performance.

Improv performer's humour comes out of truth

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Backstage before his solo improvisational show, David Shore is "freaking out."

He will perform onstage alone, and with no script.

"It's a really terrifying thing to do," he said. "It's really nerve-wracking."

Shore, a writer, producer and improv performer, said being a solo improviser is "scary," because you can't rely on others, "you have to trust yourself.

"[Before the show] I'm a wreck," he said. "I'm so in my head, I can't relax. But once I'm in the show, it's very enjoyable. The energy of the crowd is what feeds me."

Shore, 36, was the first solo improviser to perform a type of long-form improv, called the harold, in Canada.

The harold, developed by the late comedian Del Close at the Improv Olympic in Chicago, is the most common type of long-form improvisation.

From an audience suggestion, a harold team of five to 12 – or just one person – perform an opening monologue or word association game. That generates ideas and inspires a series of scenes. The team then performs three separate scenes based on the ideas from the opening. Soon the characters from the scenes begin to interact, while the story lines overlap.

Because Shore has no idea what the audience will suggest, he said the only way to prepare for the show is to "practise the form" and rehearse with his musical accompanist.

He said people often don't understand that he is making everything up on the spot.

"My sisters' friends saw the show and said, 'That's a really funny show David wrote.'"

It was during frosh week at the University of Western Ontario that Shore first began taking sketch comedy classes at The Second City in London.

After graduating from Western, Shore attended Ryerson University's radio and television program. During the writing and production of a show, his father passed away.

"It hit me a couple of days before the show," he said.

After his father's death, Shore decided to give up performing, and headed to Los Angeles to find a job as a sitcom writer.

It wasn't until Shore saw an hour-long, completely improvised live "movie" that he became "addicted" to long-form improv, he said.

"It blew my mind and it scared me. I found it really, really scary. I just couldn't fathom how they did it."

Shore soon became a member of L.A.'s Improv Olympic and took classes at the Groundlings School of Improvisation.

"I performed every week for a couple of years and eventually ended up coaching a team," he said. "We had to rehearse every week and we didn't get paid one dime to do it."

Shore said everyone thinks he or she is able to go on onstage and do improv.

"The great improvisers rehearse and rehearse and rehearse," he said. "It takes a long time to learn. I don't walk into a hospital and say I can go perform brain surgery. This has taken me years."

Shore said being a good improviser involves having "the nerve to do it" and being able to "embrace mistakes and criticism.

"A lot of stuff I do in improv is to face my fears. If I'm not scared before the show, then I know there's something wrong."

Shore is an alumnus of The Second City Mainstage in Toronto and Paramount Television's comedy writer's apprenticeship program. He has been teaching at the The Second City Training Centre in Toronto for three years.

"[Teaching] can be really rewarding and really frustrating," Shore said.

He explains to his students that they don't have to try to be funny all the time.

"Improv is not about being funny; it's about telling the truth, and the humour comes from the truth."

Shore's opening monologue of life stories often contains a lot of Jewish content.

"I like to 'Jew-it-up,'" he said. "Being Jewish is a big part of my life. I'm a Jewish guy, and it's going to come out."

Shore said it is important for improvisers to be willing to hear the truth about themselves from someone with a critical eye.

One of Shore's coaches in L.A. did not allow him to talk about Canada or Judaism for a year, because that was his "crutch" or "go-to."

"For me, it was hard to hear, 'you always talk about Canada and you always talk about being Jewish.' But [learning not to rely on these topics] made me a more well-rounded player."

Shore said he is writing a book of stories from his life and he is working on a sketch comedy show.

He currently performs in Monkey Toast, a two-act, long-form improv that he also produces.

The show, which includes 12 improvisers, one monologist and one musical accompanist, allows Shore to perform with other improvisers, which he prefers to working alone.

"Good improvisers love to perform with other good improvisers. No one gets into improv for money. You do it because you love it. If I could do just one thing for the rest of my life, it would be improv."

Monkey Toast starts at 10 p.m. on the first and third Tuesday of each month, at the The Second City. Tickets are $7.99 + GST. Call 416-343-0011.

Eye on Arts

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II: I. B. SINGER, PROLIFIC EVEN IN DEATH

In Love and Exile, Isaac Bashevis Singer's revealing autobiographical trilogy, he describes an early story, In the World of Chaos, that was never published.

The story's hero, Singer recounted, "was nothing less than a corpse who didn't know that he was dead. He wandered across Poland, attended fairs, called on rabbis, even allowed himself to be proposed for marriage." The story ends when the protagonist seeks out a kabbalist rabbi to explain his life's mystery to him. "Unbutton your gabardine and you'll see that you're wearing shrouds," the rabbi tells him.

Singer admitted that he identified with this strange hero because "I lived yet was ashamed to live, ashamed to eat and ashamed to go to the outhouse. I longed for sex and I was ashamed of my passions... Man is the only creature who is ashamed to be what he is. The whole human culture is one mighty effort to cover and embellish itself, one huge and complex fig leaf."

For a somewhat different reason, Singer's "dead man walking" seems an apt symbol for the writer himself as we mark the 100th anniversary of his birth this summer. Why is it not surprising that this impressively prolific writer, who habitually dipped his pen in the inkpot of the supernatural, still seems to be churning out new stories and novels from beyond the grave?

Since his death at age 87 in 1991, Singer's production has hardly seemed to flag. That year brought a first English translation of Scum, a novel evoking Warsaw's back streets from early in the century. The first English edition of The Certificate appeared in 1992. Meshugah, a newly discovered novel about Holocaust survivors in New York, made its English debut in 1994.

As a prized contributor to the New York-based Yiddish Forverts for decades, Singer was generally too busy creating new material to worry about the ultimate disposition of the various novels that the Forverts serialized in Yiddish. He was often content to let them languish in obscurity.

Shadows On The Hudson, another novel mined from the Forverts' back pages, was published in 1998. It was the author's fourth major work to be published posthumously and the first of his novels set on American soil; it was widely reviewed and may even have appeared on some bestseller lists. Some critics, however, astutely observed that its bleak vision and unsavoury characters may have been a large part of the reason it had lain undisturbed for so long.

For many readers, the Nobel laureate's masterful collection of autobiographical stories In My Father's Court (1956) ranks among the best work of his long career. Many of us were astonished and delighted, therefore, when a new vintage collection on the same theme, More Stories from My Father's Court, appeared in 2000.

In The Hidden Isaac Bashevis Singer, a 2001 anthology of essays by diverse authors, literary scholar Nathan Cohen observed that despite the profusion of works by Singer already extant in many languages, "many others still remain hidden in the yellowing pages of Forverts and other Yiddish newspapers and periodicals – enough to provide years of work for translators, publishers, and researchers alike."

As an example, Cohen described one important early autobiographical novel that had previously received scant, if any, critical attention. Varshe 1914-1918 was partially serialized in a Polish Zionist newspaper in 1935, just as its author was readying his first novel, Satan in Goray, for publication in Yiddish. He left for America soon afterwards and apparently abandoned the autobiographical work, which described his own youthful experiences in Warsaw.

At least one other Singer novel, Yarme un Keyle, still lies undisturbed since its original appearance in instalments in the Forverts of half a century ago. Joseph Sherman, who translated a chapter for The Hidden Isaac Bashevis Singer, noted that it was a radical departure for Singer. Sherman described it as a gangster novel peopled by forgers, blackmailers, gangsters, seducers, white slavers and murderers, set in Warsaw before World War I.

Last month the Forward, the Yiddish paper's English-language sister, published an eight-page special section on Singer, and included Two, a newly translated tale of depraved love.

This summer, the Library of America, a U.S. publishing house, is also commemorating the centenary of Singer's birth with the release of a fancy, three-volume "authoritative" boxed set of his stories, edited by Ilan Stavans, that includes several stories never seen before in English.

As pundits and critics shine a fresh spotlight this season on the extraordinary career and legacy of the world's most famous Yiddish writer, it is remarkable to note the steady stream of high-quality, newly translated works that have appeared under his monicker since his demise.

For all we know, Singer is taking an impish delight in all of this. I'm positive that many established writers would be thrilled to maintain that level of production while they are still alive, never mind when they're dead.

French comic's show offensive, but not actionable: Jewish groups

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups found controversial French comedian Dieudonné M'Bala M'Bala's one-man show in Montreal offensive, but neither B'nai Brith Canada nor Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) called it anti-Semitic and both agree he did not cross any legal lines.

The two groups took different approaches to Dieudonné's week-long appearance at the Just for Laughs Festival. B'nai Brith wrote to festival organizers asking that they ensure that Dieudonné, who was convicted in France of defamation of Jews, not incorporate any anti-Semitic remarks into his stand-up act. B'nai Brith warned against "importing French anti-Semitism into Canada."

CJC, on the other hand, did not attempt to have the show cancelled, but like B'nai Brith, it sent a representative to opening night at the Theatre du Nouveau Monde to monitor it.

"This particular performance of Dieudonné may not hold up to what qualifies legally as incitement to hate. But we still need to be cautious of the grey area between freedom of expression and incitement – an area that Dieudonné exploits to the fullest – in order to ensure that we do not fan the flames of hate and ignorance," said B'nai Brith national legal counsel Steven Slimovitch, who attended the show.

He described it as "replete with underlying racism… ridiculing the perceived idiosyncrasies of minority groups" and filled with "crass images and vulgar language that stereotyped" Jews, observant Catholics, Haitians and others. A number of times, he said, Dieudonné appeared to be mimicking the Heil Hitler salute.

(Dieudonné sparked outrage last December when, in a live performance on French television, dressed as an Orthodox Jewish settler, he raised his arm in the Nazi salute and shouted "Isra-Heil!")

Slimovitch feels Dieudonné is making racism "more palatable," and not, as many comics who deal in ethnic humour claim, highlighting differences as an ironic means of illustrating a common humanity.

Slimovitch said he was disturbed by the positive response of the sold-out audience, which gave Dieudonné a standing ovation at the end.

CJC, Quebec region executive director David Birnbaum, who was also at the show, said: "Did I like what I saw? No. Were Jews and Israelis targeted to a greater extent than other groups? Yes. Was it fair and in good taste? No. Did it cross any of the reasonable limits of Canada's laws on freedom of speech. No it didn't… He had every legal right to put on the show that he did."

Birnbaum said he was particularly offended by two actors behind a barricade on stage throughout the show. He took them to be posing as Israeli soldiers.

"They acted as censors at various points." Birnbaum said.

In defending his right to free speech, Dieudonné obliquely blamed the Jewish community for trying to silence him, Birnbaum said.

"I think he had his tongue firmly in his cheek in coming up with the title Mes excuses [My Apologies] for the show."

The show was previously performed in Paris and Brussels to favourable reviews.

CJC knew Dieudonné was coming to Montreal at least two months in advance, Birnbaum said. "I want to underline that at no point did CJC seek to cancel or change the show… It was not for us to try to censor or stop the show. The limits of humour must be very broad, but we did want to watch very closely for anything that went beyond the law."

Slimovitch defended B'nai Brith's decision to publicly sound the alarm over the show and to ask that curbs be put on its content. He also has no regrets if it apparently boosted ticket sales.

"History has taught us that we are better off shedding light on issues like this than leaving it to the private milieu. Obviously, this means there is often a cost to pay," he said.

B'nai Brith was disappointed in the festival's initial response to its letter expressing concerns about Dieudonné's appearance. Executive vice-president Frank Dimant called the booking "irresponsible," adding that, "far from taking these concerns seriously, festival executives have taken the bizarre approach of claiming that [Dieudonné's] humour will further inter-religious understanding."

In a July 9 letter, to B'nai Brith League for Human Rights president Allan Adel, festival vice-president for public affairs Michele Bazin wrote that the show "will contribute in a humourous way to reflection on the fights between people as well as the wars of religion. We believe that this subject is a burning issue of the day and merits being debated."

She also noted that the festival received no complaints from "Muslims, Jews, Christians or others" last year after Dieudonné, in a sketch about 9/11, acted as a Muslim coach giving instructions to fundamentalist Islamic terrorists.

"Why then, before he has even opened his mouth in Montreal, is he being condemned?"

At a press conference before the show's opening, Dieudonné, who is black, said he has been misunderstood by Jewish groups and that he is "just doing my job as a comic" by making people laugh about sensitive subjects.

Describing himself as half-Cameroonian, half-Breton, Dieudonné, 38, said he is, first of all, "a humanist and universalist." He sees himself as a political satirist who takes aim at everyone, but is not racist or anti-Semitic.

"I know my style can shock, but that's my right, the right to blaspheme."

Festival president Gilbert Rozon added, "He's fighting racism. He's a great comedian, not a racist."

In France, Dieudonné has won all but one of the 17 cases of racial defamation that have been brought against him. He was acquitted of defamation for his Nazi salute act on TV last December. In February, his show was cancelled by a Paris theatre for safety reasons after the theatre's management said it received threats.

Dieudonné is appealing a fine he received in May for remarks he made in the French newspaper Le Monde that Jews control the media.

100-year-old runs 100m in 30.86 seconds – a new record

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAPE TOWN — "Flying Phil" Rabinowitz, a 100-year-old resident of Cape Town, ran 100 metres in 30.86 seconds on July 10 to set a new world record.

The achievement, which enters the Guinness Book of Records, knocked nearly six seconds off the previous record of 36.19 seconds for 100-year-olds over 100 metres, set two years ago by Austrian Erwin Jaskulski.

Rabinowitz has been invited to race the former record holder Jaskulski at the Senior Olympics in Honolulu in November, and he is also slated to compete in a walking challenge in Sydney, Australia, next month.

Friends said Rabinowitz clocked an even faster time of 28.7 seconds the previous week, but a malfunction in the electronic timing equipment meant it could not be officially recognized.

"I feel like I could break another record," Rabinowitz said after the race at Cape Town's Green Point Stadium. "Every time I run I just feel younger and younger. I'm not quitting any time soon. As long as I can get up in the morning I will run and walk."

Rabonowitz, who turned 100 in February, walks four miles a day and still works – he does the books for his daughter's dog food business.

Hockey player, swimmer named Manitoba Jewish athletes of year

By MYRON LOVE
CJN prairies correspondent

WINNIPEG — Skyler Berman, an all-star defenceman with the Selkirk Steelers of the Manitoba Junior Hockey League (MJHL), and swimmer Naomi Casiro are this year's Manitoba Jewish Athletes of the Year. The co-winners were recently presented with the Idy and Max Nusgart Memorial Award at the annual YMHA Sports Dinner.

"It's a pretty good feeling getting that kind of recognition in the community," Berman said. "It was a great honour."

Berman, 20, has been playing organized hockey most of his life. Four years ago, he graduated from local leagues to a spot on the Nipiwin Hawks of the Saskatchewan Junior League. Over three seasons with the Hawks, he won recognition as the club's most offensive defenceman, most gentlemanly player and the Selects 2002 Viking Tournament Cup defenceman.

He joined the Steelers (Selkirk is a 20-minute drive north of Winnipeg) last fall, helping the team to its first Manitoba Junior Hockey Championship and Turnbull Cup since 1987. Berman scored the game-winning goal in the final game of the championship series. He was named to the MJHL 2nd team all star and won the league all-star fastest skater competition.

Berman has accepted a scholarship to play NCAA Division I hockey next season at Union College in New York state.

Casiro, 17, has been swimming competitively for six years and was a member of the Mantha Swim Club. She collected nine gold medals for Team Winnipeg at the 2003 Junior Maccabi Games in Tenafly, N.J. Her accomplishments have won her a place on the Canada Games training team.

Her family recently moved to Victoria, B.C., where Naomi's father, Dr. Oscar Casiro, accepted a new position.

The Nusgart Award winners each receive a $500 bursary from the Fred Glazerman Fund and a one-year membership to the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

This was the 32nd annual YMHA dinner. It also honoured the Y's and the Rady Centre's past presidents over the last 85 years. (The Rady Centre is the successor to the Y).

Funds raised go to support a variety of Rady Centre programs. The guest speaker this year was hockey legend Phil Esposito.

Beverly: "So, Kokes, I'm pleased to see that you brought home more than T-shirts, fans and kimonos from Japan this year. I'm not surprised that today's deal was the highlight of the quarterfinals of the 2004 NEC Cup, a wonderful international tournament sponsored by NEC Corporation and Japan Contract Bridge League. It's such a wild thing that if we didn't know better we'd suspect that our playful friends on the JCBL staff had poured sake into the dealing program."

Eric: "In Poland/Russia vs Israel, South took the reasonable view that North would cover one of his two "Losing Trick Count" losers or that E/W would wrongly sacrifice in spades. Both Norths led the 9♣ against 6♠ doubled; declarer had to lose two diamonds for –500, the par result.

"That not every two-loser hand is a strong two-bid was illustrated by Canada's George Mittelman, a man who has learned through bitter experience that there is nothing more humiliating than opening 2♣ and having to sacrifice against the opponents' vulnerable game or slam. Hence, a gentle 1♥. Allan Graves, a classmate of Mittelman's in the School of Hard Knocks, emulated his partner in trying to slow down the dangerous auction. Hence, a gentle 2♥. Despite the Canadians' best efforts, they too could not talk their opponents out of sacrificing. Graves led a trump and the defenders got their three tricks: -500.

"By now I hope you can trust me to report only the truth. Here's what happened at the fourth table. If the other three results, thoroughly infused with tactics, deception and insurance, were enlightening, consider the sandbagging efforts of Canada's own Joey Silver, who patiently bid to 3♠ and 4♠ before having to sacrifice in 6♠, much as he expected he'd have to do all along.

"North, Brian Senior appreciated that a heart lead was not only pointless but also potentially dangerous, but couldn't tell whether the defenders' outside trick source was in clubs or diamonds. Hoping to know more after seeing dummy and thinking it might be important to hold the lead, Brian made the expert lead of…the ♦K. Unfortunately for him, he was in no position to lead to trick two. Pablo Lambardi, who had been bestowed with that privilege, was not keen to cash the A♣ at the potential cost of a 300-point undertrick, and saw no pressing need to worry about dummy's diamonds as Senior would normally hold the queen. Accordingly, he decided to exit passively with a heart to force dummy. John Carruthers, the declarer, was pleased to accept that force, but was even more pleased to discard one of his four clubs. The other three went on dummy's diamonds after trumps were drawn and JC chalked up +1660. I am incapable of making up a story as good as this one, 19 IMPs to Canada.

"Indonesia gained 11 IMPs against USA when the US N/S pair forged on to 7♥ but were unable to convince their Indonesian opponents to sacrifice. And China-Ladies, the long-shot winners of the tournament, gained an unusual IMP by selling out to 4♥ in one room for –480 while doubling 6♠ for +500 in the other."

Beverly: "You know, my love, that if there were lots of deals like this one I'm glad I stayed at home to hold down the fort. Much less dangerous! Although Brian Senior is not anyone's idea of a sympathetic character, the poor guy really paid an unbelievable price for a well-reasoned opening lead."

Returning to the Kotel

I am just outside the Old City of Jerusalem walking toward the Kotel. The sun, a beautiful shade of orange and yellow, is slowly setting and soon I will be welcoming in the Sabbath.

My surroundings remind me of my last trip here six months ago. But this time, my emotions are stronger. I am more familiar with the history and the richness all around me and under my feet.

By MIRIAM PORTER

I remember having wonderful Shabbat meals back in January, in magnificent apartments with archways leading into every room. I purchased my first Artscroll Siddur at the Moriah Bookstore and knew my life was changing. Elderly women tied red string around my wrist as Lhanded them money given to me before my trip to ensure a safe journey.

Now I am back and about to experience the Kotel all over again. I am incredibly nervous, and my heart is beating so loud I worry the people around me will hear it. The Kotel on Shabbat is not only unbelievably spiritual for me, but also very romantic. I straighten my skirt and fix my hair as if I were going on a date, although, of course, there is no comparison.

I finally enter the Old City and reach up to touch the huge mezuzah on the archway. The wall is covered with gaping bullet holes from the war. Once inside the Jewish Quarter, I pass the War Memorial, which says, "To the fallen of the Jewish Quarter in the War of Independence."

I think about the soldiers who fought so I could be here today. I know soldiers are fighting now so I can be here tomorrow.

I continue walking and I wonder if my distant relatives walked the same stairs that I am about to go down to bring their sacrifices to the temple. What were they feeling? What did they look like?

A little Orthodox boy, with adorable blonde ringlets and dressed for Shabbat, runs by me, laughing. The image of five-year-old children playing in the streets without fear is one the news media fail to portray when covering Israel.

I walk by the stores of the Cardo and remember the ring I purchased there and have worn every day since. I pass the Mizrahi Bank and Bonkers Bagels and I know I am very close to my destination. Only a few more flights of stairs and I will be there.

Other people are marching down next to me and singing songs to welcome in the Sabbath. The crowd and noise around me slowly vanish and I am the only one in the world. I finally look out at the Kotel and my eyes fill with tears at its beauty. It is just the way I remember it. The men's side of the wall is packed with dark suits and the women's side with flowing skirts.

As I walk up to join the crowd, I don't let having to pass through metal detectors ruin my moment. Around me are so many types of people. There are pregnant women, elderly women, children and teenagers. Some have lived in Israel their entire lives, while some have made aliyah or travelled from all over the world to be here today.

I manage to wiggle my way to the front. As I touch the wall, I am mesmerized by the spiritual significance of where I am. There are personal notes sticking out from every single crevice. Next to me is a young woman inserting a picture of an older man, perhaps her grandfather, into a free spot in the wall. I look at her face and realize I know her. My shoulders are touching other praying women because of the lack of space, but no one notices.

When I am done davening, I close my siddur and add my own personal prayers. I pray for my family, for my friends, for the homeless people living on the streets of Toronto, for Israel, and for myself.

At that moment, at the Kotel in the Old City of Jerusalem, I knew I had come home.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

The calendar year 2004 reminded me recently that it has been 40 years since I began my university studies in the joint program between Columbia University and the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. The 4½ years that I spent in that program were filled with intellectual inquiry and pedagogic stimulation. They inspired me to become a teacher of Jewish studies and provided me with mentors who remain teacher-models for me to this day.

Raised as I was in a low-income family in Toronto, it is no small miracle that I was afforded the opportunity of the superior education I received at Columbia and JTS. All of it is due to an initiative that grew out of the Beth Tzedec Men's Club, which still functions today. At the time, Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, alav ha'shalom, offered me the possibility of studies in New York, and Nathan Hurwich, may he be given long years, made it possible. It was a dream that I never could have imagined for myself without the Beth Tzedec Men's Club Scholarship for Higher Jewish Education.

The wonderful news is that since then, scores of other students have gone on to study at many different schools, universities, yeshivot and ulpanot with the gracious assistance offered by this quiet but effective fund. This year alone, 11 scholarships were granted. Even better, the Beth Tzedec Men's Club has seen fit to make this scholarship available to any Jewish student, regardless of affiliation or denomination. The schools that host these students are also from a wide spectrum of denominations and ideologies. This kind of pluralism and community spirit from a Conservative synagogue is to be highly praised. It is so easy to stay narrow, but so refreshing to witness the largesse that this approach signifies.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto also administers similar scholarships, such as the Gasner-Berman and Pulver funds. As a genuine response to the need for young Jewish educators, it would be good for family foundations and other Jewish institutions to consider following the leadership offered 40 years ago by Beth Tzedec. Supporting young women and men who wish to become Jewish educators is the only way to ensure continuing Jewish creativity and originality.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Dr. Norman Epstein: a Jewish hero

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Theodor Herzl was a journalist. The initial normalcy of his life was, in part, what made his achievements as a Zionist visionary so great.

Norman Epstein is a local physician. That's partly what makes him larger than life.

They are both regular Jewish guys who have engaged in part-time heroism.

URBAN WRITER

Norman is my hero. He launched Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), pursuing a powerful struggle to save the people of Western Sudan.

On the second Sunday of July, I listened closely as he spoke on behalf of the people of Sudan at a sparsely attended rally at Queen's Park.

It was the hottest day of the summer to date, and only a few people showed up. I sat on the steps of the legislature building with Rabbi Lawrence Englander and his wife, Cheryl, from Solel Congregation in Mississauga; a couple of their congregants; Adam Fuerstenberg, the director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre; and Robyn Tousson, of Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, and her boyfriend, Cobie.

Some hundred Sudanese and most of the major television networks were also there.

Norman spoke; he was brilliant. Dramatically, he discussed the world's repeated indifference to genocide, the concentration camps in Western Sudan and the two million Sudanese who have been slaughtered since 1984.

He chided the United Nations for its half-hearted efforts and called upon the Canadian government to initiate a UN resolution condemning the savagery, gang rapes and mutilation of the black African population in Western Sudan.

As Norman gave words of encouragement to the tiny but feisty group, some of the Sudanese women rhythmically responded in round – sort of an echo of the frenzied black Baptist churches of the U.S. South.

When the good doctor finished, I hugged him in appreciation for inspiring me and ensuring a role for the Toronto Jewish community in Sudan. As Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel experienced after the civil rights movement march on Selma, Ala., on which he walked beside Martin Luther King Jr., "I felt my legs were praying."

Norman hugged me back and then apologized saying, "I'm sorry I wasn't able to bring more people out."

I said to him, "Norman, you got the media out. Your message will get into the living rooms of thousands."

He is an insightful man, with a righteous heart, and he replied, "Avrum, I don't understand why I haven't been able to create a groundswell of support. We all know the horror. Where is everybody?"

Later, some Sudanese leaders thanked me repeatedly for the enormous support of the Jewish community. Mohammad, a strapping figure, told me he is confident that the Jewish community will help stop the genocide, because "they understand." I told him we would do our best.

Norman introduced me to Sudan. He convinced me to fight the first genocide of the new millennium and taught me that freedom demands we act responsibly when innocent children plead for help.

Since then, Ve'ahavta, CASTS (www.geocities.com/castsudan/website), and global Jewish organizations have launched a crisis response to assist the Sudanese in refugee camps in Chad. We have received $15,000 from a Jewish philanthropist for relief items and a $100,000 donation of pharmaceuticals from Walter Arbib a Toronto Jewish community member and humanitarian. Our goal is to raise $100,000.

On Monday morning, Norman returned to the emergency ward where he works. There, his hands mended the bodies of the sick and dying in Toronto.

Once his professional day was over, he returned to his wife and children and humble home to engage in his after-hours heroics on behalf of black Africans he will never meet.

This is the greatness of Norman Epstein – a local Jewish physician.

2004 Krinos Taste of the Danforth biggest Greek festival this side of the Athens Olympics

Toronto's Krinos Taste of the Danforth, North America's largest Greek street festival, takes place August 6 –8. One short week before the 2004 Athens Olympics, the 11th Annual Krinos Taste of the Danforth is also the largest Greek festival outside of Greece. And according to Sue Zindros, Chair of the GreekTown Association, "This year's Krinos Taste of the Danforth is perhaps as close as you could get to the Olympics without flying to Greece."

The RBC Olympic FanFair is coming to the Danforth, letting visitors try their hand at sports such as rowing, gymnastics and basketball, as well as meet past Olympic medal winners like aerial freestyle skier Veronica Brenner.

The Danforth will also feature a special Olympic Village, with paintings by Greek and Canadian artists, Greek Shadow Plays themed on the hero Karagiozis, and an area featuring Olympics memorabilia and sports gear.

The Krinos Taste of the Danforth will also be home to the Olympic Trading Pin Event. Those interested in starting their own collection can choose from over 450 different designs from the 2004 Athens games, being sold here for the same price they'll be sold at the games themselves.

Four Krinos Taste of the Danforth sponsors are also Canadian Olympic Committee sponsors and partners. In addition to Krinos Foods Canada, sponsors include RBC Financial Group, VISA Canada and BBI Telecommunications, and all are helping Canadian athletes participate in the games.

While the Danforth is best known for Greek cuisine, it mirrors the Olympics in another way: it's a place for people from all over the world to enjoy the foods of the world. Diners can sample delicacies from Spain, Japan, India and elsewhere, as well as Greek dishes.

The cultural side of the Olympics hasn't been overlooked either. The Danforth's stages are home to fashion shows, world music, and dynamic Greek performers, and have played their part in building early fans for artists like Jim Cuddy, Wild Strawberries and The Waltons.

Krinos Taste of the Danforth Chair Chris Trahiotis promises this year's event will offer the traditions that have made the Taste a Toronto summer staple — food, fashion and fun — along with the activities letting Tastegoers be part of the Athens Olympic experience. "Krinos Taste of the Danforth is a very special part of summer in Toronto. There's something for everyone to enjoy, at an event that shows the very best of Toronto as a clean, safe, multicultural place to live, really live. And this year we get to celebrate the Olympics too!"

Sharing the taste of Greece at Mezes

Sharing the taste of Greece with its customers, and accordingly celebrating family and culture, is the definition of Mezes' appeal. Consistency, quality, and freshness have been the anchors of its success.

For years Mezes has been enticing patrons to choose from a markedly extensive menu of its namesake: small, appetizer-sized portions of deliciousness meant to be ordered in multitudes and collectively enjoyed by the table. In fact, this communal style of dining, which is as authentically Greek as the gastronomy, serves to uniquely heighten the experience at Mezes.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food, and it encourages people to try new things."

Hungry diners, in Sue's experience, tend to order familiar things, or "comfort food". Mezes encourages diners to blend the familiar with the new. The fact that everything at Mezes is made fresh from scratch, with the finest natural ingredients, is added incentive to experiment.

Seafood abounds on the Mezes bill of fare. Certainly try the tender grilled octopus, or the shrimp prepared one of three ways: broiled and crusted with garlic; surrounded by fresh vegetables and splashed with lemon; or baked with feta in a tomato sauce. The fish, broiled whole and drizzled with the best olive oil, is embellished only by the promotion of its own natural flavour. Dolmades — grape vine leaves embracing a delicate mixture of rice, ground beef, and dill — remain one of the most popular selections. The tender lamb chops, ordered by the piece or as an entrée, have inspired quite a following of their own. Vegetarians will delight in a vast number of menu items, among them the Gigantes — lima beans slow cooked with garden vegetables and fresh herbs in a tomato base.

For the summer, Mezes has a covered, luxuriously curtained, waterproof pavilion that extends the warm, candlelit setting of the indoors right out into the street. Christina's crown jewel of Danforth

For truly authentic, upscale Greek cuisine, live entertainment and star quality, no restaurant shines quite as brightly as the effervescent Christina's. Outside, its golden frontage sports elegant wrought-iron signage, and its year-round patio is THE spot to eat, greet, see and be seen — an epicentre of Danforth activity. Inside, earth tones, buttercup yellow and turquoise form a soothing backdrop for historical Greek etchings.

Christina's is ideally suited for private functions such as Bar Mitzvah parties. Indoors, a cozy, slightly elevated dining area at rear provides intimacy; outdoors, the patio reigns supreme for open-air celebrations. Christina's also does a brisk business catering to special events.

If you've been to Greece, you'll appreciate the distinctive differences in Christina's menu. In addition to wonderful mainstream Greek fare such as succulent leg of lamb and moussaka (both traditional and vegetarian), you'll find specialties such as Kolokithokeftedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, gently pan-fried to golden crispness. THIS is GreekTown at its finest. The assorted dip platters (Pikilia Mezedakia, cold; Christina's Pikilia, hot & cold) are teeming and delicious.

Fish and seafood are delivered fresh daily. Choice abounds; there's even a Seafood Souvlaki, with large, marinated chunks of calamari, shrimps and scallops, grilled to perfection.

The portions are always generous, the prices reasonable, the wine selection vast — including many wines imported directly by Christina's from around the globe.

Live entertainment on weekends includes belly dancing and a two-piece (bouzouki and guitar) Greek band playing a blend of old and modern Greek tunes. There's nothing like a rendering of Never On Sunday or Zorba The Greek to tug at your heartstrings and whet your Greek appetite. On Saturdays and Sundays, a delightful continental brunch featuring many traditional favourites is served.

Enjoyed inside or out, the GreekTown experience doesn't come any better.

2004 Most Memorable Meal Awards, "Best Greek Restaurant" — Where Toronto

"What's not to love about GreekTown?"

Can you be crazy busy and still take time to smell the roses? Saul Korman says Yes — and cites, as evidence, the controlled chaos at the resplendent, newly-renovated Korry's. "We've never sold so many suits. We've never sold so many blazers. I've hired three new tailors. It doesn't stop — and I love it. I guess we're doing something right," he grins.

Of course, he's had over 50 years to get it right, and literally thousands of satisfied customers to get it right with. "Without my customers, I'm nothing," he intones. "Thank God there are enough people out there with an appreciation for quality and service."

As one of Toronto's foremost purveyors of the Hugo Boss and Canali lines — and more recently Strellson, now graced with its own standalone boutique — Korry's has long championed the virtues of dressing for success. Vindicating his stand is the recent movement away from business casual and back to the traditional suit or jacket and tie. It's a classic look that "worked yesterday, works today, and will work tomorrow," says Korman. "You simply can't go wrong with a suit. It's a home run." This resurgence is enhanced by luxurious fabrics (many of them crease-resistant); updated styling, with lots of side-vented jackets; and flat-front pants. Black is still the leading power colour, with navy, gray, and taupe also in demand.

Renaissance of a timeless classic

The Strellson collection features suits, sport jackets, shirts, ties, shoes and jeans in a host of exciting new fabrics and colours, particularly pastels. The line is endorsed by Real Madrid, but you don't need world-class soccer skills to enjoy it — just a bit of flair and panache.

Complementing the Boss, Canali and Strellson labels are Korry's homegrown Arnold Brant label, with avant-garde styling and high-end fabrics at approachable prices. The line includes some spectacular silk and cashmere sport jackets. And of course Korry's in-store Roberto label — the focal point of his ever-popular two-for-one promotion — remains a magnet for men throughout the GTA and beyond seeking cutting-edge quality with unbeatable value.

For an ultrachic edge to casual, Korry's also carries the hot new Alberto line of jeans, available in several colours and form-fitting fabrics. "If you have to wear jeans, these are the one to wear; they're a cut above," he enthuses.

Community involvement a priority

Korry's is also carrying a greatly-expanded collection of fine shoes, the better to stroll the Danforth with.

Korman is a tireless proponent of the "look good, feel good" adage. "If you're looking for an edge in the business world, why ignore the easiest one to get — looking great, and feeling great about yourself? People respond to that. If they can't get past your outer self, your inner self may not stand a chance. And no one ever got a compliment for being underdressed."

While the expertly-fitted and tailored merchandise scurries out the door almost as soon as it's racked, Korman is even prouder of his community involvement. His philanthropic efforts on behalf of the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation Board, of which he is a Director, have earned him a place among its "Citizens Of Distinction". Long-standing ties to the Riverdale Shul (President Gabbai Steve Jackson) and the Danforth Jewish Circle provide a welcome, soul-nourishing respite from the hustle and bustle of everyday business life. What's more, says Korman, "it's all here — all I have to do is walk out of my front door, and I'm there. Now this is why I'm crazy about GreekTown. The best restaurants. The best cafés. The best fashions. Two synagogues within walking distances. Try finding THAT in a mall," he exudes. "Around here you don't have to stop to smell the roses — they're all around you."

A highlight of Korman's community involvement is his co-sponsorship of the annual Toronto East General Hospital Golf Classic, an annual fundraising event which this year took place on June 14 at Scarboro Golf and Country Club. He's also a kingpin in most GreekTown events, particularly the annual Taste Of The Danforth, which raises money on behalf of a number of charities. If Korman is enthusiastic about men's fashion, he's positively ballistic about the Taste Of The Danforth.

"We're talking about the largest street festival in North America here", he crows. "We're talking about sampling the best of a dozen different cultures, right here in GreekTown. You can't eat better and you can't eat cheaper anywhere else, anytime — and you're benefitting worthy causes to boot. What' s not to love?"

Korman's radio commercials, heard daily on a variety of local radio stations, are a natural extension of his effusive personality. He ad-libs them, live from wherever he happens to be when they air — often from his cell phone. Love him or hate him, virtually everyone who listens to radio in Toronto is all ears when his dulcet tones swathe the airwaves. They're a refreshing change from the canned commercials we all get so tired of hearing. "My radio spots are prepared fresh from scratch — just like the food in GreekTown," he winks.

"My radio commercials are prepared fresh from scratch — just like the food in GreekTown"

Spend a few minutes with Korman, in the friendly confines of Korry's or in a neighbouring restaurant, and you'll quickly learn that the unbridled enthusiasm of his radio spots is no put-on. What you see and hear is what you get. He wears his heart on his sleeve. After a visit to 569 Danforth Avenue, chances are you'll be wearing your heart on your sleeve too — a Boss sleeve or Canali sleeve, no doubt — and loving it.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Kettleman's: real bagels with real taste

"Finally — a real Montreal-style bagel! Now I don't need to stock up every time I go back to visit."

Whether you're an ex-Montrealer craving the taste of a bagel made the way you remember, or a Torontonian looking for the truly authentic flavour of a bagel made the old-fashioned way, your search is over. Kettleman's may be located in the heart of GreekTown, but even the most discerning Bubbie or Zaydeh would recognize these bagels as the real thing.

What makes a Kettleman's bagel different than any other bagel in Toronto?

1. Tradition! A centuries-old European recipe made with the finest flour, specially milled for Kettleman's;
2. Hand-rolling to give the bagels their unique chewy texture;
3. Boiling in honey water for a hint of sweetness;
4. Baking in a wood-burning oven to produce the distinctive taste and crusty exterior that bagel lovers everywhere adore.

Baked fresh all day long, Kettleman's bagels are scrumptious eaten warm as they come out of the oven. Or take home a dozen (or two) to store in your freezer: they're just as delicious toasted.

But what's a bagel without the shmear? At Kettleman's you can choose traditional deli-style cream cheese or one of the many delectable spreads made fresh on the premises — lox, chive, dill and hot pepper, to name but a few.

Kettleman's is open daily from 7 a.m., so treat yourself to a freshly baked poppy or sesame bagel with cream cheese and Nova Scotia lox. Or gather all the fixings for a truly special brunch. Even your Montreal friends will be impressed!

Exotic delights at Sher-E-Punjab

The soulful strains of the sitar greet you as you enter. The deep, rich earth tones of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — are at once exotic and peaceful. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajastan, adorn the butternut-yellow walls.

You're not even seated yet, and already you've begun to experience the tranquility that is Sher-E-Punjab.

SHER-E-PUNJAB RESTAURANT

351 Danforth Avenue

For Amar and Malkit Singh, this is more than a restaurant; it's the place where they've lovingly served Northern Indian home cooking for the past 30 years. Recently joined full-time in their endeavours by son Jaspal, they've not only shared wonderful flavours, but also touched everyone who'se visited with their gentle demeanor and quiet dignity.

Connoisseurs of Punjabi specialities have known about Sher-E for decades, but with its recent major renovation and the growing popularity of Northern Indian cuisine, a much larger dining public has come to know and savour its diverse delights.

Widely reputed for its Butter Chicken, Chicken Tikka Masala, Pakoras and Samosas, Sher-E holds the distinction of making Toronto's finest Naan bread — a soft, oval loaf that's best served hot. But be forewarned: it's addictive! Hand-made on the premises, it is baked fresh virtually on demand — every 15 minutes or so, at busy times — and delivered piping hot to your table. The experience of seeing it emerge from the massive Tandoori clay oven is surpassed only by the pleasure of eating it. This, truly, is manna from heaven.

Saag — a pureed mixture of spinach, broccoli, and rapini — is another dish prized by Sher-E's customers for its unique combination of sharp and mellow tastes. The ever-popular Daal (pureed lentils) and Bartha — barbequed eggplant with green peas — are also first-rate.

If you can put down the Naan bread long enough to order dessert, try the refreshing Kulfi (Indian ice cream). Indian Tea – strong, sweet, and mildly spiced — is a piquant complement to any meal or dessert.

Those unfamiliar with Northern Indian cuisine tend to associate it only with curry. To be sure, you'll enjoy fine curried dishes here, made from scratch with the freshest, hand-blended spices; but this is only a very small part of the culinary picture. Sher-E-Punjab completes the tableau with elegance and grace, and with the kind of personal attention, respect and warmth that's only found in a long-established family business.

Nowhere is the multicultural appeal of the Danforth better exemplified than at Sher-E-Punjab, and those who visit it are in for a richly rewarding experience.

Pantheon sets standard for fresh fish

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. How fitting that in this, the year of the Athens Olympics, you have that same opportunity at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown.

The spectacular decor sets the stage for a royal feast. In the East wing, creamy white floor tiles etched with gold offset walls alive with colourful murals and capped with finely etched wooden trim. In the West wing, rust-coloured tiles and a working fireplace effect a similarly regal ambience. The tables, bedecked with crisp linens in white and gold, are flanked by real wooden chairs.

Pantheon's ever-growing clientele has allowed it to double in size while retaining its charm, intimacy and culinary excellence. Though its mainstream Greek cuisine compares favourably with that of other Danforth restaurants, fresh fish from Greece is what keeps Pantheon's loyal following coming back in droves. Whole sea bass, striped bass, red and white snapper, orange roughy, black porgy, salmon, red mullet, sea smelts — the variety is incredible, the preparation impeccable. As one major daily noted, "Above all, small fish imported from Greece, such as anchovies and baby sardines . . . demand repeat visits. [This lovely fish] is what sets Pantheon apart from most Toronto Greek restaurants."

"... fresh fish, care with good products and little razzmatazz nudges Pantheon ahead of most competitors ..."

Chef Nick Paroussis — who, with partner John Troupis, is responsible for maintaining these lofty standards — clearly understands the need for delicacy and refinement when preparing fresh fish. Likewise for the fresh Ontario lamb chops, which can be enjoyed on their own or as part of a substantial mixed grill.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts provide a fitting conclusion to your meal. The traditional baklava is enticing, as is the homemade Greek honey cake — "as golden and desirable as an Olympic medal" (Toronto Star).

Pantheon's prices are actually below average for the Danforth — exceptional value for a GreekTown outing that ranks second to none.

Trapezzi: where "Opa" meets "Bravo"

Sleek, sexy, and resplendent behind its slate gray facade, Trapezzi has brought downtown Italian culinary flair and glitz to the Danforth.

Trapezzi — Greek for "table," as in the familial dining table — lives up to its moniker with grace and panache. The interior features a long, lean, granite bar flanked by plush bench seating seductively swathed in jaguar orchid velour. In a typically Italian juxtaposition of sumptuousness and starkness, honey-brown birch flooring and amber parquetted ceiling tiles cozy up to textured concrete walls.

Owners Paul and Angelos wanted "to add a new dimension to the Danforth, to complement the excellent Greek restaurants that are already here in abundance, in an environment that's chic but friendly."

The menu boasts many gems that, even in the few short months since Trapezzi's opening, have earned it a steady following. For starters, try the bruschetta with whipped goat cheese — a crisp, refreshing new take on an old favourite. The pastas — by which any Italian menu ultimately will be judged — pass with flying colours. Try the Forest Mushroom Fettuccine, redolent with bourbon cream sauce, roasted garlic, and truffle oil — richly flavourful but never overpowering. The Smoked Chicken Penne (braised portobello mushrooms, sundried tomatoes, scallions, roasted zucchini and asiago cheese in a smoked chicken broth) delivers with equal aplomb. For the "fusionado", the Pesto Linguini's artful blend of sundried tomatoes, pine nuts, pesto, kalamata olives and goat cheese will resonate with the Greek and the Italian palate alike.

Highlighting a commendable selection of pizzas is the Meat Pizza, with light tomato sauce, chorizo sausage, pancetta, roasted garlic, carmelized onions and gorgonzola cheese.

Fresh, homemade desserts — the fitting conclusion to a complete dining experience — showcase Trapezzi's expertise and attention to detail. Their lavish and ambitious white chocolate and blueberry strudel is a visual and gustatory delight.

Everything's fresh, made to order, and with ample flair and flavour to satisfy even the most demanding connoisseur.

Trapezzi means table; at 505 Danforth Avenue, it also means taste. Italian cuisine, served with traditional Greek warmth . . . when "Opa" meets "Bravo", it's beautiful.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Sushi Delight leads in taste, value

Now entering its fourth year on the Danforth, Sushi Delight has established itself as Toronto's leader in quality, freshness, variety, and price.

A recent renovation has enhanced Sushi Delight's already bright and inviting decor, making the dining experience even more enjoyable. With a menu that's easy on the pocketbook and delightful to the palate, Sushi Delight is always busy, and their lunch special is the best value you'll find anywhere.

Complete meals, in a Bento box, range from $6.95 for the Vegetarian Box, which includes Tempura, to $11.95 for the Tokyo Box, which includes Sushi. Sushi Delight's Special Party Trays are a hit for large groups; priced at $29.95 for 48 pieces or $49.95 for 86 pieces, they offer tremendous variety and value. Custom catering is available, as is take out and delivery.

For a light meal or a tasty snack, four delicious Sushi Bar specials are offered: three at $6.50 and the delectable 6 pc. Sushi Pizza (a crispy Sushi Rice Base topped with Salmon, Green Onion, White Onion, Tobiko & Special Sauce) for $6.95.

You can taste the Sushi Delight difference in the freshness of the ingredients, and the entire menu is MSG-free. Good taste and good health at great prices, a cheery atmosphere, and a caring staff — what more could you ask for in a sushi restaurant?

Big Carrot's commitment to organics & service repaid by customer loyalty

How do you remain the leader in an increasingly crowded field? By stocking your shelves with products that are as good for the environment as they are for your customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. From humble beginnings in 1983, The Big Carrot has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living.

Organic, GMO-free, Kosher products

Run as a worker owned co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

Anchoring the Carrot Common Mall with a laid-back, homespun atmosphere that its customers value as much as the products themselves, The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

While most health food stores carry a few brands of a particular item, The Big Carrot often has half a dozen or more, and its well-versed staff is more than happy to help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher — or a combination thereof. The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Neil's Prepared Soups; Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Cold Mountain Miso; Jersey Farm Non-Dairy Soy Yogurt; cookies from Organica; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods. For babies and toddlers, Stonyfield Farm YoBaby Yogurt, in 6 x 4 oz. packs, is both organic and Kosher.

The Big Carrot carries a tremendous variety of healthy desserts and sweets. Tropical Source Kosher chocolate bars, made in Israel, are available in several delicious flavours. Try the Toasted Almond! Country Choice Sandwich Creme Cookies and Ginger Snaps, Pavich Farms packaged dates, raisins and pitted prunes, and Cocoa Camino Fair Trade Cocoa mixes are both organic and Kosher.

Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups are popular mainstays, as are Bob's Red Mill packaged grains, cereals and baking goods; the Big Carrot stocks both in abundance.

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold. From the Organic Lentil Daal to the Organic Couscous Salad, every item is a taste and visual treat. It also offers a selection of sinfully delicious desserts without the sin, since they're free of refined ingredients.

The Big Carrot's Wholistic Dispensary, located across the courtyard, constitutes a store in its own right. Among other Kosher products, it carries Omega Flax Seed Oil and selected Solgar Supplements.

Of Toronto's growing number of juice bars, The Big Carrot's is the only one that's 100% organic, giving you, in a quick pit stop, the optimum high-octane fuel. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats. Popular blender drinks include Zen Berry (banana, blueberries, orange, vitamin C crystals, bee pollen, flaxseed oil, and protein powder) and the Energy Elevator (carrot, spinach, raspberry, Ginseng). This isn't just juice, it's a meal replacement.

Toronto's only 100% organic juice bar

Among the sandwiches, try the Grilled Tempeh, lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo. Fresh, delicious and wholesome — just as Nature intended.

For a summer treat, enjoy Mapleton's organic ice cream, as well as Cool Hemp, a Kosher, organic non-dairy dessert available in a cup or wholesome organic waffle cone.

Through its continuing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. If you want the word "stress" to disappear from your vocabulary — at least temporarily — shop here.

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

Plenty to woo your senses

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

A solid community with solid values

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Styling your life

An exciting new addition to the Danforth, Wash Up & Brush Co!, has taken a new approach to the "lifestyle store", a clever concept fusing retail fun with professional hair care – boutique meets salon.

"This is what hair salons everywhere should be!" said one gleeful Wash Up & Brush client as she left with her purchases. The store has an eclectic mix from the latest trends to classic styles. Products include jewellery from hip Canadian lines Soul Flower and Foxy, handbags from Oakville-based Karen Wilson and Montreal-based Matt & Nat, as well as a varied selection of hats, pashminas, watches, innovative home décor items, bath and personal care accessories. The hair care department provides fashion forward hair styling and quality hair care products from L'Oreal Professionnel, M.O.P, and Nioxin. Specializing in Coloring and Highlighting, the stylists have extensive backgrounds in cutting and color, and can help clients achieve whatever style they are looking for.

"We felt the product selection in a salon could be much greater, to give the client, who is already in a "self-pampering" mood, the ability to create a look in a one stop shopping environment," says Marc Miltenburg, Co-Owner of Wash Up & Brush Co! "What better time to pick up the perfect earrings and evening bag for your special night out than when you are waiting for your colour to process and you have time to pass," adds Susan Drysdale, Miltenburg's business partner. "And our customers agree. They love the concept."

Wash Up & Brush Co! is sure to have something that appeals to everyone, whether it's that perfect little bag or a fabulous new haircut and color!! See you there!

Cheers! You must be at Yia'mas.

Good things often come in small packages. A prime example of this is Yia'mas (Greek for Cheers), a new, little gem of a place nestled in the centre of GreekTown that will have you raising your glass to its good food and good cheer.

This quaint, intriguing enclave is richly ruby-toned, from its granite-topped cherry wood bar to its comfortably upholstered cherry wood benches, maroon-coloured walls and earth-toned limestone tile floor. Smaller and more intimate than its TV namesake, it's fronted by an invitingly diminutive patio. Formality is eschewed in favour of an easy-going, relaxed ambience.

YIA'MAS
494 DANFORTH AVENUE AT LOGAN

"We cook not only with our head, but with our heart"

The menu, like the space, is small in size but big on flavour. The bifteki is a case in point. This Greek specialty combines lean, sumptuously seasoned ground beef and veal with a mixture of shredded cheeses, melding together in an exuberance of flavour. It's fast become a house favourite, especially among its discerning Greek clients — always a good sign. The fresh Ontario lamb chops enjoy similarly high repute among customers of all origins, and you've simply never tasted a better breast of chicken, gently rendered in lemon sauce with olive oil, fresh oregano and parsely.

Prices are quite moderate, the service down-home friendly. The beverage selection includes Greek, French and Italian house wines.

Enjoying jovial hospitality and pronouncing long Greek names are two key components of the GreekTown experience, and partners Sokratis Stentsiotis and Angelos Panagiotidis accommodate on both scores. Both are well-attuned to their customers' wants and needs. Says Sokratis, "Coming to GreekTown means relaxing and enjoying real home cooking, fresh from scratch with the best ingredients, like your mother used to make. This is what our customers expect, and this is what we give them. We cook not only with our head, but with our heart."

A visit to Yia'mas will have you saying "L'chaim" to these sentiments.

Jane Hall's palette captivates public, industry alike

In three short years, the design team of Jane Hall and Ian Levack has experienced exponential growth and garnered a lifetime of recognition.

Since opening their doors at Pape and Danforth in 2001, Hall and Levack have seen their two-person operation grow to a team of eight people, and their range of services expand to encompass the full spectrum of home furnishing, interior design, restoration, and construction.

Achievements In Retail Concepts award

Hall's many years of fabric designing, mural painting and fine art ushered her into the world of custom furniture and interior design, while Levack's background involved creating products for the home on a licensing basis, including the first Royal Doulton licensing program for home furnishings.

As individuals, both were highly accomplished; as a team, their synergy has altered the landscape of an industry. In 2002, from a field of over 50 entrants, Hall and Levack were awarded the prestigious Cadillac Fairview Achievements In Retail Concepts award. Said Peter Sharpe, President and CEO of Cadillac Fairview, "Retail in Canada is alive with dynamic new ideas and concepts and Jane Hall: The Voice Of Color is a striking example of this innovation and vitality."

"It's about bringing color into one's life", Hall explained. "We Canadians live in so much grey most of the year, why do we want that in our homes?" Hall's award-winning approach is to enthrall the eye and appeal to all the senses with her use of the colorful paints, elegant fabrics and sumptuous furnishings on display in her stunning European-style showroom. Here, six room vignettes evokes a range of moods with inspired color combinations.

In fact, to call this a "showroom" is to somehow diminish it, for it has the aura and feel of a highly personal space. Hall and Levack don't tell you how colors work, they show you. The visual feast — a glorious palette of mustard, fuschia, avocado, yellow gold, burnt orange, and other breathtaking hues — demonstrate a quasi-spiritual connection with color.

"I'm anti-beige," Hall confesses with a grin, adding that color evokes an emotional response in people, from the passion stirred by reds to the calming effect of blues. "Color helps you take emotional possession of the house. They may move in the boxes, but they never move in emotionally. Color makes people feel differently about themselves and the home."

Though Hall and Levack's clientele now includes celebrities such as actress Luba Goy, who credits Hall with making her home come "alive with color," they have maintained the same down-to-earth approach with which they entered the business.

As Toronto's real estate market continues to boom, the demand for Hall and Levack's talents from this sector has grown accordingly. House staging for showings has become a major component of their business. Many homeowners who've utilized their services for this purpose have seen the value of their home subsequently soar above the industry growth curve. To Hall and Levack, this success is bittersweet: "The treatment of each home is so personal, in a perfect world you'd like to see that connection continue indefinitely," smiles Hall.

Property values spike after Hall treatment

From a simple in-store consultation to the building of your dream home — and everywhere in between — no palette is more vibrant, no brush more eloquent than those held by Hall and Levack. They are, truly, the voice of color.

Danforth Jewish life a study in dedication, diversity

Riverdale Shul: the "little shul that could"

It doesn't have a full-time Rabbi. Its congregation numbers in the hundreds or the dozens, depending on the day and the event. It operates out of a second-floor space slightly larger than a telephone booth. It has too little of just about everything.

Except heart.

Founded in 1994 by noted filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, this "little shul that could" caters to a diverse cross-section of congregants. In so doing, it mirrors the ethnic and cultural diversity of its Danforth setting. Home to the successful and the down-and-out, the well-connected and the disenfranchised, it fills a unique need for some 5,000 unaffiliated Jews living in the downtown area as well as others drawn to its unique spirit.

Filling a unique need for unaffiliated Jews

For an Orthodox shul, it's pretty darn unorthodox.

"It's a miracle we're even here," says Gabbai Steve Jackson. "We're all volunteers, funding is tough, and our mere existence defies logic. But we're here for the community, and whatever we do, we do with a lot of simcha, a lot of joy. We dance in the streets."

The shul offers regular Shabbos services, irregular Friday night services, Yom Tov services, children's Cheder, adult learning, classes on ethics, mysticism, and other subjects.

Along with the main sanctuary, which converts to a lecture hall or Kiddush room, the shul has a kids' playroom.

Services are relaxed and informal, and are often led by a guest rabbi. Guest speakers also appear periodically.

The shul does not sell tickets or memberships, and welcomes all who are moved to participate, either on their own account or in a volunteer capacity. It does, however, accept donations.

The Danforth's many fine restaurants and shops have long been a favourite destination of Jews throughout the GTA, but for those who actually live and work in the Danforth area, the Riverdale Shul holds an entirely different kind of appeal. To its core group of congregants, it's a spiritual oasis. Says veteran GreekTown merchant and congregant Saul Korman, "It's a godsend. I'm proud to be associated with it."

Congregants from all walks of life

Typical of the Riverdale Shul's unprepossessing attitude is the message on its website: "Come on, check us out. Enjoy our davening, our Kiddish lunch, our cakes and most of all, our congregants, from all walks of life."

Persons interested in learning more about the Riverdale Shul can contact Gabbai Steve Jackson at 416-826-4539, or by e-mail (gabbai@riverdale-shul.org). You can also visit the website at www.riverdale-shul.org, or drop by their visiting area in front of the shul at 179a Danforth Avenue (east of Broadview) during the Taste of the Danforth August 6 to 8.

Danforth Jewish Circle: building community values

Some seven years ago, a handful of interested parents met in Debbie Plested's living room and decided to start a Jewish studies program in the Riverdale area.

They were all members of the newly formed Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a grassroots, liberal egalitarian congregation in Toronto's east end, established in 1996 and then chaired by Marlee Wyman.

Giving children a sense of community

At the time, Plested, co-chair of the DJC education committee, said children's education was a priority for many DJC members.

"We were really a community," she recently said. "We wanted our kids to learn and study within our community and feel a part of the community."

Plested said the group recognized the necessity of setting up a program that could meet the diverse educational needs of the children.

At that time, the local Hebrew heritage program, a school board program that had been operating in the neighbourhood for some 15 years, could only offer a basic introduction to Jewish studies, she said.

"The program was instrumental in creating a sense of Jewish identity and a sense of community," she said. "But [it] had trouble developing as a curriculum because it had to cater to a wide age group.

"What was happening was that our families had no choice but to look outside the community to further their child's Jewish education."

The group of parents met many times in the course of the year to establish a community-based supplementary school. They had to develop a curriculum, hire teachers and publicize the program to attract students, find funding and find a space to hold classes, Plested said.

Now in its ninth year, the DJC Children's Jewish Studies program runs weekly classes for elementary school students out of a local school.

Through discussion, debate, music, drama and art, the children study Hebrew, Torah, Jewish history and current events, Jewish holidays and rituals, Plested said.

"Our program values Judaism as a dynamic, living religion. Our students learn to understand what it means to be a Jew and how being Jewish affects our values, beliefs and behaviour."

While the exploration of Jewish identity is a key component of the curriculum, Plested said that given the high proportion of interfaith families, there is also an emphasis on "respect for the broad spectrum of multiculturalism which exists within Judaism and in the neighbourhood."

The goal of the Hebrew language program is to help the children learn to read Hebrew, recite the basic prayers and gain familiarity with Hebrew songs, she said.

"We want the children to be able to decode Hebrew so that they'll be able to prepare for their Bat or Bar Mitzvah... If they have more of an interest in conversational Hebrew, we encourage and assist them [with] supplementing their studies by connecting them with a tutor."

In addition to the school, the DJC offers a B'nai Mitzvah program, which is run by parents and not funded by any group. "This group is the beginning of a connection to the community for the future because the kids are building friendships and bonding as a group," Wyman said.

B'Nai Mitzvah program: building and bonding

Wyman said she marvels at the growth of the community education program.

"It shows you what a group of dedicated volunteers can accomplish. They're incredibly motivated. That's the whole thing about volunteerism: action is taken because we want to see results."

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Nobody does Greek like The Palace

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
722 Pape Avenue at Danforth
416-462-1166

"The ambiance ... of a Greek country home"

"The Greek goddess Helena would venture to the Danforth" for the Dolmadakia

"The grilled chicken, the lamb dishes, and the kebabs are beyond superb."

— Metro News, June 2, 2004

At The Palace, every meal is a special occasion. From the moment you enter, you're treated like royalty.

Among a royal selection of appetizers, the Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki) is a meal in itself; the Cold Mezze Platter (Tzatziki, Taramosalata, Melitzanosalata, Kalamata Olives and pickled beets with pita) is similarly lavish.

Among the soups and salads, the Avgolemono soup — chicken and rice broth finished with gently whipped egg & lemon juice — is the essence of delicacy, the Greek salad crisp and generously portioned.

The Rack of lamb and moussaka are standard-bearers, and The Lamb Kleftiko's divine combination of lamb, feta cheese, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms is enticingly ensconced in crisp phyllo pastry.

The Palace is also highly reputed for its fresh fish; try the Grilled Swordfish Steak with lemon and herbs, the Whole Broiled Sea Bass, or the Atlantic Salmon Steak. Whatever your preference, you'll find it here, prepared to the absolute maximum of its flavour.

As befits a Palace, there's a private Party room for up to 100 people. Located on the upper level, it's ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

Chef Napoleon and the staff go to great lengths to ensure your comfort and satisfaction. A visit to this culinary kingdom is pure pleasure; nobody does Greek like The Palace.

Kalyvia: new twists from an old reliable

The more things change, the more they stay the same. New restaurants come and go, but GreekTown's old reliables continue to grace our dining tables with the home cooking we know and love.

At Kalyvia, the tastes of home are everpresent, and their new menu combines the best of the old and new. The combination platters of seafood and meat, priced from $25.95, still set the standard for taste and value. Each offer a staggering variety of Greek specialties, yet each item is prepared with individual attention and care.

Fish and seafood lovers will find plenty to adore here. Try the delectable Xifias (swordfish souvlaki) or the Halibut and Sea Bass steaks topped with Kalyvia's own homemade lemon sauce. Like everything else at Kalyvia, it's made fresh daily from scratch. There's simply no substitute for this kind of care and attention to detail, and it's earned Mike and Peter Tsafatinos (both from the Greek town of Kalyvia) an unerring reputation for homemade Greek cuisine at the Danforth's most approachable prices. These lofty standards for quality and freshness have earned Kalyvia a four-star rating from Toronto by Night Journal.

While Kalyvia's cuisine is authentically Greek, it's a family place that caters to appetites of all ages. One area of the menu that particularly appeals to the younger set is the Makaronada (spaghetti), available in a variety of entrées and as a side alternative to rice or potatoes. It's a fun way to introduce skeptical children to Greek cuisine. Makaronada à la Kalyvia will make them kvell, as will the Mosxaraki Kopanisto: oven-baked breaded veal cutlet topped with tomato sauce and cheese, with a choice of spaghetti or rice and roast potatoes.

Under the watchful eyes of the Tsafatinos' sons Jim and Jim, and a host of other family members, each and every dish emerges from the kitchen brimming with homemade taste. Portions are gargantuan — worthy of any doting mother.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

Myth, or reality? You decide.

So many superlatives, from so many sources. Is Myth too good to be true?

Thankfully, the qualities that drew an outpouring of rave reviews on Myth's opening in 1994 are still in evidence today. For example:

- "The most distinctive new restaurant on Toronto's Danforth strip" (Adele Weder);
- "Myth sets a new standard on the Danforth by which everything else will be measured" (Sara Waxman);
- "...heaven for vegetarians, both in terms of choice and finesse ... fragrance and flavour to die for." (Vitality)

Today's Myth is actually a restored theatre with theatrical mystique intact, complete with a loft-style mezzanine that hosts some of Toronto's most upscale private parties. Architecturally, it's a glorious fusion of Greek, Far Eastern and Italian motifs, outrageously hurled together in a rich palette of gold, black, copper, maroon, and pewter. Improbable on paper, it works spectacularly well in person. With palatially high ceilings and enthralling sightlines, Myth is fronted by gigantic, articulated glass garage doors that unfurl to accommodate the Danforth's most lively patio.

Myth has achieved ultrahip status while maintaining a firm grip on the warm hospitality and consistently high quality that are the underpinnings of any fine restaurant.

Executive Chef Ken Brudner's menu is Mediterranean, but like the decor, it melds influences from further afield. One example: the Roasted Chicken & Mushroom Pie: filo wrapped with pine nuts, lemon and chive beurre blanc, served with baby spinach and roasted carrots. Eclectic vegetarian offerings include Imam Biyaldi (currants, pine nuts & saffron pilaf stuffed in purple eggplant with melted onions & tomato). Among the pastas, try the Rabbit Stifado Mantia: oven-baked pasta purses with aromatic spices, mavrodaphne jus & pearl onions. For more mainstream tastes, the grilled Black Angus Striploin Steak is absolutely scintillating.

Bar Mitzvah parties

Its size and cutting-edge chic have made Myth a prime destination for Bar Mitzvah parties and other catered private events. If you haven't yet had the pleasure of this Mythological dining experience, one visit will corroborate everything you've heard and read about it. That's Myth — and reality.

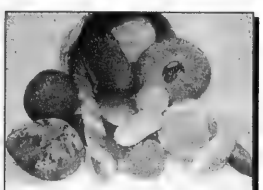
Select Bakery evokes childhood memories

A bakery is not merely a place where bread is made. It's a symbol of sustenance that evokes treasured memories of still-warm goodies emerging from the oven with a maternal blessing and simultaneous admonishment not to overindulge.

Nowhere is this symbol better exemplified — and brought to life on a grand scale — than at Select Bakery. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), its majestic array of baked bounty is to the palate what surround sound is to the ear. Enhancing its seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.

The father-and-son team of Emmanuel and Kosta Katsamakis, with a combined 50 years of expertise in baking, lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktoboureko, petits fours et al) is complemented by exceptional European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

Further distinguishing Select is its prepared foods. No time to cook? Moussaka, pastitsio, Greek-style lemon oregano chicken — and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are prepared fresh daily for your dining pleasure. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.



Select BAKERY

But we digress from the baked temptations. Among the highlights at Select are:

- European Village Bread: crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside;
- Kalamata Olive Bread: as good as it sounds. Buy two;
- Chocolate-covered baklava: a hybrid pioneered by Select, it picks up where "to die for" leaves off;
- Mille feuilles: Select's version makes a good run at the proverbial thousand sheets, each one shatteringly good.

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group.

Athens Pastries redefines taste buds

It's easy to recognize Athens Pastries and Pies, with its cheerily distinctive mosaic tile facade of slivered turquoise and gold. Once you've ventured inside, however, the taste sensations you'll experience will leave it etched in your memory far more than the visuals.

You've undoubtedly tasted, and probably enjoyed, the traditional Greek spanakopita (spinach pie), cheese pie, meat pie and bougatsa before, but until you've sampled the Athens versions, you haven't truly experienced them at all. Simply stated, it's like comparing homemade fresh-baked bread as your mother used to make it to the store-bought variety. For freshness, crispness, and flavour, no comparison is even possible.

The Athens version will permanently redefine your taste buds. Baked continuously throughout the day from the purest ingredients, with no additives or preservatives, the pastries and pies served up at this little gem of a shop have made Athens a prime destination of Danforth-goers seeking a light meal or an exquisite dessert. A nice bonus: their coffees, both regular and specialty, are as fresh and full-flavoured as you'll find anywhere.

(1 block South of Sheppard)

When you're not in GreekTown, you can enjoy Athens' second location, conveniently located on Victoria Park just south of Sheppard, with ample free parking on site.

Everything at Athens is worth trying, but if you're a dessert lover who'se been disappointed occasionally — haven't we all? — the bougatsa will really send you over the top.

Reminiscent of the French mille feuilles, or the English custard slice, Athens' rendition of bougatsa is as close to perfection as a dessert gets: ultracrisp, delicate crust outside, light, mildly sweet vanilla custard inside. And here's the best part: even with a liberal sprinkling of icing sugar and cinnamon, at no time does it taste too sweet, and the cloying aftertaste so common with commercial desserts is noticeably absent.

This second-generation family business (owner George Tsioutsioulas, father Evangelos and their dedicated staff) has probably rolled enough pastry dough to stretch from here to Greece, so the name "Athens" is perfectly apt. The fact that it's rolled lovingly, with constant attention to quality, is confirmed by your first bite.

If you own or manage a business on the Danforth, chances are you've seen me, met me, and been asked by me to participate in this section. As its coordinator for the past ten years, I've made it my business — and my pleasure — to pound the pavement in GreekTown, telling anyone and everyone who'll listen that this section is the best thing since sliced bread.

That's if you're a bakery. If you're a Greek restaurant, it's sliced souvlaki.

Every great street has a pulse, and only in person, on foot, can you really feel it. Only by meeting the people who live there and work there can you truly experience its personality, hear its message, and feel its magic.

Digital communications may have made our world smaller, but I've always found that ten blocks of cold calling — and the social interactions it engenders — make my world larger than life.

I have another reason for wearing out shoes. When I was a toddler, a certain Mr. Torontow regularly came by our home peddling his wares — fruit and vegetables — from his horse-drawn cart. Often, with a wink, he'd hand my sister Avivah and I a brown paper bag filled with pastries that his wife had made. This wasn't about currying favour. It was just who he was.

I may never be half the man Mr. Torontow was, but by going door to door, as he did, maybe I'm hoping to capture a bit of his aura.

Now, about the cap.

When the sun shines brightly on GreekTown, as it usually does, a bald head like mine can get sunburned very quickly. One such experience was enough to sell me on covering up as conditions dictate. Donning a baseball cap also makes me look and feel younger. (Illusions are a wonderful thing).

A community's cachet may manifest itself in sensory pleasures, but its character is defined by the people who live in it and work in it. Today, I'd like to thank those people — the people of GreekTown — for allowing me into their world and for making me feel special.

If you believe in karma, then the joy and fringe benefits of Greece's recent European cup win, the annual Taste Of The Danforth, and the upcoming Athens Olympics are no coincidence. What goes around comes around.

Sunburn's no fun, but a quick tan never hurt. So today, as the sun beats down on the Danforth, I doff my cap to GreekTown. Hats off to you; you deserve it.

— Sholom Wargon

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Messini Authentic Gyros a GreekTown hit

In one short year, Messini Authentic Gyros has created a new taste sensation in GreekTown.

Recognized for its beautiful beaches, the city of Messini, in the southeast corner of Peloponessos, is also known for its excellent southern Greek cuisine. Following some 20 years of experience in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece.

Roasted slowly to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process, during which a consistent temperature must be maintained. Prepared fresh from scratch — no freezing, no precooking — Messini's version will make your palate sing.

Once your gyros is ordered, the meat is carefully sliced and served in a soft, fluffy pita with tzatziki, onions, spices, and French fries (ironically, the traditionally Greek style).

Messini has further innovated by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros, allowing it to cater to a broader range of dietary preferences and palates.

According to Dafnas, each component of the gyros, including the pita it's served in, is designed to maximize the taste and enhance the flavour of the overall product. The result: a sandwich that absolutely melts in your mouth with a rich blend of flavours, the subtleties of which seem to become more distinct with each bite.

Messini now also offers a delicious grilled Greek sandwich, consisting of a panini-like bun topped with a combination of hard Greek cheese, tirokafteri (Greek cheese sauce), eggplant spread, and tomatoes. It's also available with chicken breast.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $9.50, lunch specials from $5.95. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Soothing brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

Heavenly home cooking at Zorba's

More and more, we seem to measure restaurants by their ability to simulate "home cooking", and a big part of GreekTown's appeal is that so many of its dining establishments achieve this goal. But if ever a restaurant could be said to welcome you into its home and sit you down at its kitchen table, that restaurant is Zorba's.

Your first clue is that the decor, while cheerful, is neither trendy nor obtrusive. Tastewise, however, Zorba's katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking) will spoil you as few restaurants can. Always off the menu and priced from $8.50 to $12.00 for a mammoth portion complete with potatoes, rice and vegetables, katsarola makes it doubly easy to forget you're "eating out".

Each day, owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos slaves over three to five of these specialties and spoons them into the steam vessels at front. And, just as you'd expect in a home environment, what he cooks depends entirely on his whims of the day. Typically roasted or stewed, these dishes won't just remind you of home; they are home.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once they're gone, they're gone, and with an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, you're advised to arrive early for best selection.

Remember your Mom's or your Bubbie's chicken fricassee? Zorba's lamb fricassee will melt in your mouth just as hers did. Lamb with orizo, a rice-like pasta, is equally heavenly, as is the beef stew. These preparations generally feature green beans, cauliflower, zucchini, or okra, often in combination, gently oven-simmered in a light tomato sauce. Vegetarian specialties include roasted gigantes (lima beans), a local favourite.

Zorba's mainstream menu tends toward casual, and many entrées are offered in three sizes (small, regular and large). The medium Greek salad could easily pass for a large; the large is off the charts. As with the katsarola, the prices are exceptionally modest. For example, the Lamb Souvlaki is offered as a sandwich for $4.75, with fries for $6.25 or with salad for $7.45.

Since Zorba's defines itself by its home cooking, it's only fitting that multiple family members be present. Try seven. At any given time, you'll find Kosta, wife Christine, sons Bobby, Anesty and Spiro, and daughters Demetra and Maria minding the store. The attitude is warm and friendly, the affection genuine, both between family members and with customers. Says Bobby, "We don't really know where home life ends and the business begins; they've become one and the same."

If you've never had the pleasure of dining in a Greek home, a visit to Zorba's will quickly fill that void in your life experience.

New look, same great taste at Pan

The ever-innovative Pan on the Danforth now sports a new look and new ownership, but its Greek / Mediterranean cuisine takes you on the same magical taste ride it always has. Cited as "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants by Toronto Life, Pan continues to deliver consistently superb quality across an array of dishes that are deliciously different — sometimes subtly, often dramatically — from other versions you'll encounter.

Pan's updated decor is festive with pastels and paintings, giving it the appearance of a mini Mediterranean art gallery. It's now open for lunch as well as dinner, and is a prime destination for intimate gatherings.

The menu complements holdover signature dishes with compelling new offerings. Try the Char-Grilled Loin of Lamb with fig and orange glaze and the Santorini Chicken, or the filet of Atlantic Salmon with Madagascar mussels, a skewer of shrimp in a white wine lemon dill cream sauce with garlic mashed potatoes and pan seared vegetables.

The Black Angus New York striploin still tops the heartiness scale; it's served with garlic mash and grilled portobello mushrooms, finished with Madagascar peppercorns in a brandy-beef reduction sauce.

The appetizers are elegance incarnate. Try the Baked Goat Cheese encrusted with pistachio, placed over tomato and a portobello mushroom cap and served with wild greens. Also recommended are the Avgolemono Soup and the Marinated Beets.

The dips — one standard by which all Greek restaurants can be measured and compared — still lead the Danforth parade in flavour and presentation.

Family restauranteurs in the finest GreekTown tradition, new owners Chris and Soula Christodoulou (and their son George) are certainly no newcomers to GreekTown, and bring a lifetime of experience to your table. To GreekTown veterans, Soula's radiant smile is as recognizable as the street signs.

Pan caters to an international clientele liberally sprinkled with movie stars and other show business personalities, but friendly, down to earth service is still the rule here.

Vibrant as ever, Pan continues to reward guests with an elevating dining experience.

Ampeli knows only one way: the right way

There's no substitute for freshness. In five short years, Ampeli has drawn the kind of rave reviews restaurants covet. George, the manager, attributes this success to a simple formula: use the freshest, highest-quality ingredients, lightly seasoned and prepared simply. Everything's cooked to order, meaning you have to wait a little longer for your meal to arrive; but the wait is more than worth it.

Meat and fish are always fresh, never frozen, and Ampeli has become renowned for both. You simply can't find better rack of lamb or Ontario lamb chops anywhere. The fresh fish is so popular customers usually specify, when making reservations, which type of fish they want. Red snapper, porgy, codfish, smelts, whiting — if it's just been caught, you'll find it on Ampeli's table the same day.

For George this means more legwork, combing the market for the freshest catch of the day. "This isn't an option," he notes. "It's an obligation to our customers."

Warm ciabatta bread accompanies every meal with a side of olive oil and balsamic vinegar. Fresh pasta is hand-made on the premises, and all sauces are à la minute.

Ampeli's distinctive red brick exterior and huge patios, complete with bright flowers, are a welcome sight for anyone seeking Greek and Mediterranean cuisine as it's meant to taste.

Roasted mashed eggplant dip is zinged with fresh mint, and marinated octopus is tender with a lovely vinegar bite. Meaty little quails have been marinated for tenderness and are cooked just so, and the grilled fresh porgy is a paragon of Piscean virtue, with especially crisp skin."

Athens 2004 Store: Olympic dream becomes a GreekTown reality

The Athens 2004 Store, in the heart of Toronto's GreekTown, is living proof that miracles can happen.

In a press conference held May 25 at the Thessalonikean Educational Resource Centre, an emotional Sotiris Buseas recounted the events that led up to the fruition of his Olympic dream.

As a water polo player with the Poseidon Kalamata Club and later with the University of Toronto Blues in the mid 1980s, Buseas saw his hopes of participating in the Olympics dashed by an injury. But as so often happens in life, no sooner did one door close than another door opened. In this case, it just took 15 years for that opening to occur.

Only store outside Greece with Official Athens 2004 Licensed Products

As president of BBI Telecommunications, a founding sponsor of the Taste Of The Danforth, Buseas was well-steeped in GreekTown business activity and community events. With his athletic career long behind him and the Athens 2004 Olympics approaching, a different Olympic vision emerged: why not make licensed Olympic products available to the Canadian public, right in GreekTown?

Buseas' road to Athens was long and arduous. To make his vision a reality, he required permission from both the International Olympic and the Canadian Olympic committees ... no mean feat for any small businessman.

After a long series of verbal, electronic and formal written communications between himself and Olympic officials in Greece, Buseas boarded a plane to Athens to attend an evaluation meeting of licensee applicants being held by the Athens 2004 Olympic Organizing Committee.

Shortly after Buseas landed, Athens was engulfed in a rare, major snowstorm. Of the applicants expected at the meeting, only a handful showed up — including one very proud Greek Canadian undaunted by a foot of snow.

Impressed by Buseas' persistence and by the fact that he was one of the very few applicants who actually met the requirements for such a project, the IOC, ATHOC and COC granted him the license.

The results of that success — and the fruits of Buseas' labour — are now on display at 457 Danforth Avenue.

The store is awash in a sea of festive colour predominated by Aegean blue. In a masterstroke of design simplicity, the entire floor is painted blue and gold, giving you the sense of setting foot in the sea as you enter.

On the shelves, on the walls, and in every nook and cranny, you'll find a truly impressive array of products ranging in price from a few dollars to a few hundred. For men and women, boys and girls, young and old, athlete and couch potato alike, there's a perfect gift item here for everyone. With an emphasis on enduring quality and artistic merit, the collection is designed to offer years of service and pleasure. This is no mere souvenir shop; it's the only store outside of Greece to sell Official Athens 2004 Olympic products.

20% of purchases go to assist the Olympic Movement and Canadian Olympic athletes

The public's response since the store opened in early June has been "absolutely incredible," says Buseas. "Everyone loves licensed products, but customers are also blown away by the quality and variety of the merchandise. Many people have also told me that in one quick stop, they are now able to purchase gifts for every family event in the foreseeable future. Birthday present, Bar Mitzvah present, wedding gift, or just because ... you name it, there is something here for everyone."

There is indeed. From calendars to fine porcelain, cool caps to plush monogrammed towels, jigsaw puzzles to exquisitely minted Olympic coins, plush toys to rugged luggage, mousepads to baseballs, the Athens 2004 Store has items for every taste and budget. Remarked one breathless shopper bearing an armful of booty, "I came in wondering what to buy; now I'm wondering what not to buy."

By purchasing these unique products, however, you're not just solving a gift-giving dilemma; you're also helping Canadian athletes fulfill their dreams. A full 20% of the purchases at the Athens 2004 Store is being donated to the Olympic Movement and the Canadian Olympic Excellence Fund.

Buseas' unlikely odyssey from foreign student to Olympic concessionaire is a feel-good story that any champion of the underdog can relate to. The opening of the Athens 2004 Store is a both product of loyalty and a reward for it. Says Mike Patterson, Director of Marketing for the Canadian Olympic Committee, "we only wanted to deal with one person ... to reward him for the hard work and for his initiative." For Sotiris Buseas, it's all about remembering where he came from.

Reward for loyalty: "nobody should forget their own roots"

"I want to show what my heritage has given the world all these years .... nobody should forget their own roots," he says. He is also quick to downplay any personal accolades he has received. "This is not about me, it's about anyone who has a dream and believes he or she can make it happen."

GreekTown's many restaurants have long touted their cuisine as "the next best thing to being in Athens." The Athens 2004 Store offers an entirely different fast track to that destination. The opportunity to buy great gifts for yourself and your loved ones — and help aspiring Canadian Olympians to boot — is a win-win situation if ever there was one.

Ambassador bids farewell

Completes tour of duty, heading home

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

TORONTO — Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon can't recall the number of times he had to turn down friends and colleagues in Ottawa's diplomatic corps when they asked him to play a round of golf.

"The commitment I made to myself was that when there will be peace, then I will play golf," he told The CJN.

Alas, golf has simply not been on Divon's agenda during the past four years.

The veteran diplomat completes his tour of duty as Israel's representative to Canada at the end of August. He visited the offices of The CJN last month and, in his careful, articulate manner, reflected on his time in Ottawa.

Single malts the toast of kiddush clubs

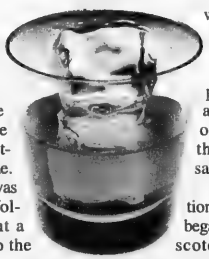
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Neil Nathan has given new meaning to sharing a toast with his parents on their wedding anniversary.

While he drank a l'chaim with his kiddush club at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue to toast the event, his parents, Bella and Phil, drank the same single malt scotch at approximately the same time at their home in London, England.

"[Their anniversary] was a significant event, [so] I logged on to the website of the distillers of one particular single malt and ordered a bottle to be shipped from Scotland to my parents' home.

"Their anniversary was on a Friday, and the following day I brought a bottle of the scotch to the weekly kiddush club, where we toasted my parents.



"In London, my parents were sitting amidst the flowers I had ordered and drinking the same scotch," he says.

Nathan, an information technologist, says he began drinking single malt scotch 35 years ago in London, at the same time as he started his career. "I had my first sniff of Glenfiddich and I suddenly discovered Scotland."

At B'nai Torah Congregation, says George Weinberger, a Toronto chartered accountant, his kiddush club – one of two at the synagogue – meets after Shabbat services. It used to be evenly split between rye and scotch drinkers, now, "more and more people are drinking scotch.

Montrealer Graduates

NEW YORK — Montrealer Daniel Levy is one the first nine graduates of Yeshivat Chovevei Torah Rabbinical School, a self-described "modern and open Orthodox institution" founded in 1999 by former Yeshiva University professor Rabbi Avi Weiss, who heads AMCHA – the Coalition for Jewish Concerns. Rabbi Levy, who is completing a master's in education at YU, will teach next year at Solomon Schechter High School in Westchester, N.Y.

Yukos Exec Wanted

MOSCOW — A Russian court issued an arrest warrant for a Russian Jewish leader and philanthropist on charges of complicity in murder and attempted murder. Leonid Nevzlin, a major shareholder of embattled oil giant Yukos, fled to Israel last fall after the arrest of his former boss, Yukos founder Mikhail Khodorkovsky. Nevzlin had already been put on the international wanted list on charges of tax evasion and stealing state property. Prosecutors suspect he contracted the murder of a Russian couple in 2002 in a conflict over financial assets.

N.Z. Jew Sought

AUCKLAND — A member of New Zealand's Jewish community has been linked to an alleged Israeli spy ring. Police were seeking Tony Resnick, a 35-year-old paramedic and former member of the Auckland Jewish Council, in connection with two Israelis jailed for passport fraud, the New Zealand Herald reported. The paper said Resnick left the country for Hong Kong after Eli Cara and Uriel Kelman were arrested in April. He is believed to have headed to Israel, where his wife and children later joined him. New Zealand accuses Cara, Kelman and a third Israeli still at large of a plot to assume the identity of a wheelchair-bound New Zealander in order to obtain his passport for a Mossad operation. Resnick had previously treated the disabled man, the Herald reported. Israel has not commented on the spy charges.

Harvard Returns Gift

BOSTON — Harvard University has returned a $2.5-million gift donated in 2000 by the president of the United Arab Emirates, Sheikh Zayed Al Nahyan, to fund a chair in Islamic studies. Students and Jewish groups at Harvard's divinity school protested the gift because of the UAE president's support for a UAE think-tank that funded speakers who made anti-Semitic comments. The think-tank has since been closed.

Charity Charged

DALLAS — A major U.S. Islamic charity was charged last week with funnelling money to Palestinian terror groups. The Holy Land Foundation was charged with sending $12.4 million (US) to Hamas and other groups promoting violence in the Mideast. Officials for the Texas-based group said the FBI fabricated evidence and relied on faulty Israeli translations of documents.

Comments Clarified

JERUSALEM — An Israeli newspaper has clarified comments by Jewish official Malcolm Hoenlein that led a U.S. Muslim group to call for his resignation. An apparently faulty translation caused the confusion. Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, was quoted last week on Ma'ariv's English website as saying that America is the "ultimate battleground" for Muslims. After the Council on American Islamic Relations (CAIR) saw the remarks and called for Hoenlein to quit, the remarks were changed to refer to Islamists, not Muslims. The mistake was blamed on a Hebrew-speaking reporter who did not differentiate between Islamists, a term that can refer to Islamic fundamentalists, and Muslims in general. Hoenlein told JTA CAIR exploited the situation, making public calls for him to resign without contacting him for clarification.

Leader Threatened

BELGRADE — The head of a Jewish community in Serbia has stepped down after receiving death threats. Members of the 200-strong Subotica Jewish community said Mira Poljakovic and several board members resigned last month. The community made no comment, and it was unclear who made the threats. The community has been split recently by internal disputes between factions that supported and opposed Poljakovic's policies. In 2001, Poljakovic, a prominent lawyer, was attacked and beaten up on the street, apparently for her opposition to the regime of ex-strongman Slobodan Milosevic.

Hoax Perpetrator Given Suspended Sentence

Marie Leonie-Leblanc

PARIS — A French woman who claimed she was the victim of a violent anti-Semitic act but later admitted she had lied has received a suspended sentence.

Marie Leonie-Leblanc, 23, was found guilty last week of reporting an imaginary crime and was given a four-month suspended sentence. She was also ordered to pay symbolic damages to France's national railroad company and get psychiatric help.

On July 9, Leonie-Leblanc told police she had been attacked on a train in suburban Paris by four men who she claimed scrawled swastikas on her stomach and overturned her baby carriage because they thought she looked Jewish. The purported attack shocked the country, with senior politicians and Jewish groups issuing forceful condemnations. Three days later, however, Leblanc admitted she had lied about the attack and that she had drawn the swastikas on her own body.

Israeli tourism ministry to invest in marketing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aharon Domb, director general of Israel's Ministry of Tourism, learned last month that his ministry would receive an extra 30 to 40 million shekels – about $10 million Cdn for marketing.

Although it's not as much as he'd asked for, he believes in "working harder" with less money, so as not to compromise his goals, he said during a recent one-day stop in Toronto.

Tourism is a wise investment for the Israeli government, according to Domb, because every 100,000 tourists to Israel translates into about 4,500 jobs for Israelis and about 200 million NIS for the country's GDP.

Over the past two years, 45,000 Israelis in the tourism industry lost their jobs, said Domb, who was accompanied by Daniela Aharoni, his senior advisor (and translator for the interview), and Rami Levi, New York-based tourism ambassador to North and South America. They were interviewed at the office of Dani Shahal, director for Canada of the Israel Government Tourist Office.

But notwithstanding the drop in tourism since the intifadah began in September 2000, Domb brims with enthusiasm for his work. "Speaking in ideological terms, this is the best job in the world. What could be more beautiful than to make Israel likable in the eyes of Israelis and people who are overseas?"

His current position, he stressed, fits well with his personal ideology, "the feeling that in Israel you have special things that you don't have in the rest of the world."

A native of Haifa who has lived in Kiryat Arba, just outside Hebron, virtually all his adult life, Domb spent most of the 1990s working for the regional council of the settlements in Judea and Samaria as well as in Gush Katif, first as spokesperson, from 1992 to 1996, and for the next three years as director-general.

Aharon Domb

Aharoni attributes the increase, which began to be apparent in late 2002, to the ministry's change of marketing approach in the spring of that year. Instead of dealing only with tourism professionals, ministry personnel began to visit communities and "speak to the end user in person. We understood that the situation is such, that you have to go to the consumer and convince him in person."

Regarding the place the territories have in the Israeli tourism picture, Domb noted that hundreds of Jews from Toronto have visited Hebron, but said that "the question of whether you visit Tel Aviv or Hebron isn't as important as the general picture."

What he wants is increased tourism to Israel, and by Israelis within Israel. From January 1 to May 31 of this year, 17,000 people visited Israel from Canada, a 74 per cent increase over the same period last year, said Shahal. He added that the number is consistent with a concurrent overall increase in tourism of 60 to 65 per cent.

On the Toronto leg of his trip, his only Canadian stop, Domb's small delegation met with tour operators and representatives of the Jewish and Evangelical Christian communities.

"We really value those communities, especially in today's geopolitical situation," he said. "If Canada has approximately 90,000 households in the Jewish community, and if each comes to Israel only once a year, that will definitely increase our tourism."

The benefits are not Israel's alone, he pointed out. "Jews all over the world have in the back of their mind the knowledge that they'll have a safe place, and that will be Israel. This connection between Jews in the Diaspora and the Israelis in Israel is very important."

But Zionist motivations and expressions of solidarity aside, visitors to Israel can "have fun and enjoy the country as a tourist destination," Domb said. "What could be nicer, in December, than to be in the Dead Sea and climb Masada, and not be here in the cold?"

A charter effort by Jews

From the editor's desk

To be sure, from the beginnings of our tradition, study was encouraged for its own sake. But our sages understood and urged upon our forebears another compelling truth: the morality that we learn in our studies must be tied to action and action must be tied to the broader good of the community at large.

That broader good of the community at large has been a central preoccupation of our teachers, scholars, writers and leaders from biblical to post-biblical and modern times.

Thus, it is not only an orientation towards text and text-based inquiry that the Jews' attachment to Torah and the commentaries has inculcated in us over the millennia.

It is also, if not foremost, an affinity, indeed a deep reverence for, the very idea and structure of law, the governance by human beings over other human beings according to law.

Throughout the years, that expression of affinity has depended upon the conditions of the local Jewish communities living at the pleasure of the non-Jewish majority. Until approximately the middle of the 19th century, that expression was directed towards running purely internal communal structures and organizations.

In modern times, however, the Jews branched out, as it were, and applied their inbred, age-old affinity for the rule of law to the institutions of the wider community.

How they did so and the different contexts and societies in which they did so make for fascinating study.

Not Written in Stone: Jews, Constitutions, and Constitutionalism in Canada (University of Ottawa Press, 2003) does precisely that. It examines how the Jews of Canada expressed this affinity within Jewish and non-Jewish organizations in the context of evolving Canadian society.

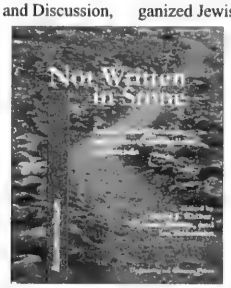
The somewhat cumbersome title of the book evokes images of a dry and dusty tome. But the substance of the book belies the image.

Edited by the late Daniel J. Elazar, president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, Michael Brown of York University and Ira Robinson of Concordia University, it is accessible and a trove of interesting archival tidbits.

Like a well-organized graduate seminar, the book is divided into three parts, each its own multi-faceted nugget and each nugget leading to the next.

Part I establishes the Setting. Its three essays essentially explain why and how the work came about.

Part II, the Analysis and Discussion, is also a chapter in three parts. It fleshes out and elaborates upon the purpose of the work as defined by the editors. The three essays in this part examine the different approaches to governance in Jewish communal institutions and also explores the impact of a Canadian as opposed to an American context for those structures.



The third part is a reference library of selected constitutional documents, some of which are decades old, from diverse Jewish organizations across Canada.

The book is rich in its eclecticism. The editors have combined their considerable collective knowledge to this purpose. Thus, the work integrates history with sociology and Judaic studies. Scholars will delight in the collection of new and archival material, along with the research and the comprehensiveness of the footnoting in the various essays. Casual readers will take pleasure in the sheer sweep of the information.

One of the most instructive essays for this reader was that by University of Toronto law professor Lorraine Eisenstat Weinrib, one of Canada's most renowned constitutional law experts. It explored the evolution of Canadian constitutional law from the political beginnings of Canada to the advent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and explores the role that the Jews of Canada played in helping shape the Charter. It is a highly informative essay about the interest in and involvement of the organized Jewish community in bringing Charter rights to Canada.

"This is a story [the promotion of full and equal membership in Canadian society] in which Canada and Canadian Jewry can take great pride," Weinrib concludes. "The Jewish community's commitment to the values of liberty and equality, as well as its security within the new constitutional order, have allowed it to strive to extend the reach of Canadian constitutional justice to include other disadvantaged groups."

Not Written in Stone is a product of academic curiosity. But its reach exceeds academia. It is an interesting read for anyone interested in the history of the Jews of Canada and the type of society they helped build in this new land for themselves and for all Canadians.

Jewish input sought in review of religious courts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Several Jewish organizations have been invited to make submissions to an Ontario government review of the use of religious courts in the province, including beit dins.

The appointment by Premier Dalton McGuinty earlier this summer of former NDP attorney-general Marion Boyd to review Ontario's 1991 Arbitration Act, which permits religious courts to function, was prompted by concern over a new Islamic tribunal that would use sharia, or Muslim law, to settle family, business and civil disputes.

Debate over the Islamic Institute for Civil Justice – the group that plans to use the act to operate panels of trained arbitrators to settle private disputes using sharia – has been roiling for months. Muslim women's groups in particular have expressed concern that the panels, whose decisions would be binding, would oppress women because sharia does not regard them as equals, especially when it comes to divorce and division of property.

Critics fear that immigrant women especially would be coerced into accepting rulings that would favour men, or else face ostracism from their community.

The International Campaign Against Sharia Courts in Canada was formed last spring and has set up a website that has gathered thousands of signatures on a petition calling on the government to halt the panels and revamp the Arbitration Act.

Others have expressed concern that the Islamic panels would constitute a parallel court and that its rulings would trump Canadian law. Officials on both sides of the debate have assured that the panels' rulings would conform to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Criminal Code and human rights legislations.

The Arbitration Act permits religious groups to resolve civil disputes within their faith, provided all parties involved consent to the process.

Under the act, the Jewish community has been operating beit dins for years to resolve mainly business and commercial disputes. Native groups, Ismaili Muslims and in some instances, Catholics also use the act to operate internal religious courts.

Concern over Muslim sharia tribunals prompts provincial investigation

Boyd told The CJN that it is not her intent to repeal the Arbitration Act or those sections pertaining to religious groups but to ensure that the vulnerable are protected.

"That includes women, new immigrants and the disabled. We're concerned about the elderly, too," Boyd said.

She said her mandate is to review "the broad picture of how the Arbitration Act is used," as well as the "implications if we removed arbitration" – presumably leaving religious communities to settle disputes using non-binding mediation.

She said she will try to find "what, if any, protections can be built into the act, [and] not to take away established rights." She stressed that decisions of religious courts would have to conform to Canadian law.

Boyd said she will seek the views of Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish Women International, the Canadian branch of the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, and Auberge Shalom, a Montreal shelter for Jewish women.

As well, Toronto family lawyer John Sytrash is preparing a submission on beit dins.

Evelyn Brook, the Montreal-based president of the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, said one of the issues before Jewish women is whether they can trust a beit din.

"There are some a woman will trust, and some she won't. It's a question of how they interpret Jewish law," she said. "Our concern has always been that a woman be allowed to take an advocate with her."

She said that in Israel, women appearing before a beit din to obtain a get, or a Jewish divorce decree, are permitted to bring advisers, known as toanim or toanot, who are schooled in Halachah, or Jewish law. She said she would like to see the practice brought to North America.

Brook said she understands the concerns of Muslim women in Ontario.

Women opposed to sharia courts have argued, among other things, that Islamic family law dictates that male heirs receive a greater share of inheritance than females (in order to look after female relatives); that only husbands may initiate divorce; that fathers are usually awarded custody of children, and in extreme cases, that fathers may force their underage daughters to marry.

They also fear that many Muslim women would be pressured into relying on the sharia panels instead of secular courts.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of the Toronto beit din, explained that while Halachah forbids Jews from taking each other to secular court, the Shulchan Aruch (code of Jewish practice) allows a Jew recourse in a secular court if all else fails.

"We are not coercive," he said.

Homa Arjomand, co-ordinator of the International Campaign Against Sharia Courts in Canada, held a three-hour meeting with Boyd on July 15. Arjomand, a Toronto social worker who says she has seen the worst of sharia in her native Iran, argued that family law must be removed from the Arbitration Act.

The issue has resonated around the world. Protests are scheduled for Sept. 8 in front of Canadian embassies in several European countries and in cities across Canada.

Boyd's report is due Sept. 30.

Cdn. Presbyterians reject Israeli divestment

CJN Wire Services

The Presbyterian Church of Canada, unlike its counterpart in the United States, has not called for divestment from Israel.

Responding to a query from the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Rev. Stephen Kendall, principal clerk of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, stated late last month that the church has "not adopted any resolution with respect to divestment in Israel."

The Canadian church's statement came after last month's controversial decision by Presbyterian Church (USA) to stop investing in Israel.

Meeting at its 216th annual General Assembly in Richmond, Va., the U.S. church, which has about 3 million members, also equated Israel with apartheid South Africa.

The vote to sever economic ties with Israel was approved 431-62. The church is believed to be the largest organization or institution to join the divestment campaign against Israel and is the first Christian denomination in the United States to do so.

"The Canadian Presbyterian Church, by refusing to go along with such a one-sided and inappropriate resolution, is helping both the cause of peace in the Middle East and the need for Canadians of all faiths to realize that Israel is the only democracy in that part of the world," Leo Adler, director of national affairs for Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center in Toronto, said in a statement. "To equate Israel with apartheid is not only completely false, but contrary to reality in Israel.

"We thank the church for their integrity," Adler added.

The U.S. church's call for divestment is seen as a potential serious matter for Israel: In 2001 the combined value of its foundation and pension fund was estimated at $7 billion (US).

According to the decision, any company earning more than $1 million annually as a result of investments in Israel, or which invests more than $1 million a year in Israel, will be entered on a blacklist prepared for church leaders. The church is now likely to divest from any company appearing on that list.

"By reaching this decision we want to make sure that we are not investing in activities of the kind we are trying to prevent. We see so much violence, and we want to assure ourselves that we have nothing to do with it," said Jay Rock, coordinator for interfaith relations at Presbyterian Church (USA).

Rock said the new divestment policy is motivated by more than a desire to insulate and detach Presbyterians from the violent Israeli-Palestinian dispute. He said the church also has an affirmative desire to "make our voice heard about the direction of Israeli policy."

Leaders of Presbyterian Church (USA), a mainline Protestant denomination, approved several other anti-Israel resolutions and also refused to halt funding for so-called messianic congregations which target Jews for conversion.

James Rudin, senior interreligious adviser to the American Jewish Committee, called the Presbyterian actions "a catastrophic disaster."

Leaders of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) strongly criticized the divestment resolutions in a letter to Presbyterian leader Rev. Clifton Kirkpatrick.

"To assert that there is a moral equivalency between the racist policy of apartheid and the efforts to protect the citizenry of Israel is unconscionable," said the ADL. The resolution "calls into question the efforts of interfaith dialogue between Presbyterians and Jews."

Presbyterian Church (USA) spokesperson Rock told the Forward that Jewish-Presbyterian relations "are very good." The only problem is a "wildly different opinion on how to go about resolving the Israeli-Palestinian situation. I think there's a blindness on both sides of the disagreement. I think there's truth on both sides."

Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, interfaith director for the ADL, said the divestment measure by the U.S. Presbyterians signalled "a new phase of aggressive behaviour in the expression of their feelings toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

He said that while the ADL and other American Jewish organizations maintain contacts with the Presbyterian church, the denomination's leaders did not inform the American Jewish leadership about preparations for the divestment policy – nor did the Presbyterians give the organized American Jewish community a chance to respond to the developments at their general assembly.

The church said it plans to issue a clarifying statement soon, saying that it will not boycott every company that invests in Israel or earns profits from business with Israel.

Rather, the Presbyterians want to direct the divestment policy toward "companies that might cause damage and hurt the peace process," Rock said.

Singled out for special attention was U.S. tractor and heavy equipment manufacturer Caterpillar, whose products have been alleged to be used by the Israeli army to raze Palestinian houses in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Sources in the Presbyterian Church said they don't know whether their church has investments in Caterpillar.

Anti-Muslim graffiti at Ryerson deplored

The government of Ontario last week joined Jewish and Muslim groups in condemning anti-Muslim graffiti found in late June at a multifaith room at Ryerson University.

Attorney General Michael Bryant said "incidents designed to degrade, threaten or intimidate anyone have no place in Ontario."

"The battle against hate and prejudice… requires a concerted effort on the part of all right-thinking, honest, humane people and organizations to take on this struggle by speaking out," said Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services.

The ministers were responding to reports that on June 23 a multifaith prayer room often used by Muslim students was sprayed with graffiti that stated, "Die Muslims Die," and included Stars of David.

News of the graffiti was reported in mid-July by the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF), based on descriptions provided by Ryerson students. Ryerson officials acknowledged the incident, but declined to describe the nature of the graffiti in detail.

Canadian Jewish Congress deplored the incident, calling it "a despicable act."

"These kinds of attacks are abhorrent and cannot be tolerated in our society," said Joel Richler, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "No one should have to suffer this kind of racism."

"An attack against one of us is an attack against all of us," said Ed Morgan, Congress' national president. "This is an unacceptable act and efforts should not be spared in identifying the perpetrators and dealing with them accordingly."

In a news release, the CAF called on Ryerson's administration to treat the incident as a hate crime and to involve police in the investigation.

The Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) welcomed Ontario's condemnation of the incident, but the CIC's president, Mohamed Elmasry, also stated, "The CIC has gone on record saying that government officials frequently downplay anti-Muslim acts, while emphatically condemning anti-Semitism, or anti-Judaism. To see evidence now of a public course correction in our government's approach to any form of hate-crime is greatly appreciated."

An international threat to peace

Can there be any doubt after the legal and diplomatic charade last week in Tehran that Iran has now become the chief threat to peace in the world? The inhumane, brutal taking of Canadian Zahra Kazemi's life and the lies and prevarications regarding its cover-up ought put an end to the notion that there is any basis on which to trust the theocratic, tyrannical Iranian regime.

What is most troubling, however, about the behaviour of the Iranian government in the Kazemi affair is not the brazen flouting of even minimal norms of fairness, decency and civility. Rather, it is the alarming fact that such behaviour has itself become the norm for the ruling ayatollahs. There is no other conclusion to be drawn from the pattern of Iran's behaviour during the past years.

The most cursory examination of the ayatollahs' record tells the malign tale.

• They have established ties with Al Qaeda. That is now indisputable. The 9/11 Commission has reported that nine of the Sept. 11 terrorists travelled through Tehran on their way to their murderous mission.

• They have been caught lying repeatedly to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) about the nature of, and their intentions for, Iran's nuclear reactors.

• They are the chief funders and supporters of terrorists cells in the world today.

• They head the most virulently anti-Israel regime in the world, leading the charge to destroy the Jewish state. They arm, equip and direct Hezbollah in south Lebanon and have provided their Shi'ite proxies thousands of missiles, many newer and longer range, that are aimed at Israel. They purchase arms for PA President Yasser Arafat's out-of-control militias. They fund Islamist terror cells in Gaza and the West Bank. And they are trying to foment insurgency among Israeli Muslims in the Galilee.

Last week, Revolutionary Guards Commander Seyed Masood Jazayeri was quoted by the Iranian student news agency ISNA as saying Iran would "wipe Israel off the map" if Israel attacked the Islamic Republic's nuclear sites. Rumours also swirled that Iran was spearheading efforts to equip the rockets it has supplied to Hezbollah with unconventional warheads.

The international community must act against Iran. The risks of inaction – not only to Israel but to the entire world – are simply too great.

In an editorial last week, The Globe and Mail argued that "Tehran must be made to feel the heat over its shameful record on domestic human rights." But there is a great deal more for which Iran must be made "to feel the heat." Iran's calculated anti-Western and anti-Israel policies threaten international peace and security.

Zahra Kazemi's murder is symptomatic of a far deeper dysfunction than disregard for domestic human rights. It bespeaks a contemptuous, dangerous disregard for human life.

Criticism of ICJ overstated

I read Ben Archibald's analysis of the court decisions on the Israeli security fence ("A tale of two courts and two rulings," July 29) and wish to voice my opinion.

Without wishing to be an apologist for the International Court of Justice, I think Archibald's criticism, as well as that of other pro-Israel commentators, overstates the case by labelling the court indifferent to Jewish lives. The court ruled that the route of the fence is contrary to international law. It did not say Israel could not erect a fence on the Green Line. The fact that Israel may have legitimate geo-political reasons not to do so does not necessarily mesh well with the international legal principles that the court based its decision on.

Given the question posed to it by the United Nations General Assembly, the court could hardly have reached any other decision, and Israel chose not to argue the merits of the case. Israel objected to the ICJ's jurisdiction and I understand that it did not try to justify the barrier to the court. The court was operating under the premise, as determined by the General Assembly, that the West Bank lands on which the fence was built are illegally occupied. As such, it was a foregone conclusion that the judges would rule that the fence is illegal. When Archibald notes that the court said it was not convinced that the route of the fence is necessary for security objectives, he overlooks the fact that Israel did not argue the point and that its own Supreme Court – in a separate, earlier ruling – concurred with the ICJ's decision, at least in part.

I think Archibald lets the Israeli court off too easily. Many are uncomfortable with the extent to which the Supreme Court feels it can overrule military decisions. It stated that it generally accepts the opinion of the Israel Defence Forces on military matters, but then substituted its own judgment for that of the military in ruling that parts of the fence must be moved. It remains to be seen if this interventionist trend will continue to pick up strength and how it will affect the security of the nation.

ICJ ignores terrorism

In 1945, the International Organization of Nations, consisting then of 50 independent countries, was established by permanent charter in San Francisco to promote and maintain international peace and security and foster understanding between free nations.

But since Israel's declaration of independence in 1948, the organization now known as the United Nations has surrendered its raison d'être to the whims and diatribes of Arab countries and their supporters.

Today, Arab countries and their allies repeatedly assault the Jewish state with foul reports and false and injurious charges, while downplaying terror attacks launched against it from Palestinian areas. Meanwhile, lawlessness, intimidation, incompetence and widespread corruption have turned the West Bank and Gaza into areas of enduring violence.

When it comes to Israel and the Middle East, the United Nations applies legal norms selectively. The UN's International Court of Justice ruled recently that Israel's security fence is a violation of international law, but it ignored the Arab countries that promote and fund incessant attacks against Israeli citizens, and it failed to call for the immediate dismantling of terror networks by Palestinian leaders. It also ignored the fact that many other countries have similar barriers.

Israel is a small country whose safety and existence is being challenged by an international organization that purports to provide equal treatment to all countries.

I hold you personally responsible for the specious and narrow-minded bent of your paper.

Maybe the word "Liberal" should precede "Canadian" in your name and you should eliminate the unnecessary word "Jewish," making it the Liberal Canadian News instead of the nonsensical The Canadian Jewish News.

Are Jews in this city, province, country infiltrated with such left-wing brain cramp, general apathy and just plain tiredness of the constant betrayal by and of our own Jewish so-called leaders, to such an extent that this fatigue and sometimes hopelessness demonstrate that we are forever stuck in this quicksand of Liberal dictatorship, which has proven unequivocally, by its own members, that it is anti-Israel and, oh yes, very anti-Conservative? Wake up!

We've been insulted by the truly undignified and useless United Nations, and now by incumbent Liberal cabinet ministers. I feel similarly about your sycophantic missives that protect your Liberal Party bias. It is time you showed fairness.

Looking for Lemkin

I am writing a biography of Raphael Lemkin (1900-1959), the father of the United Nations Genocide Convention. After World War II, he helped his brother Elias Lemkin to settle in Canada, with the aid of his cousin Ruth Agulnik of Montreal. I am seeking information about Elias Lemkin, his wife Lisa and their two sons.The Lemkins were also friendly with a Mr. Roskies of Grosvenor Street in Montreal. I would be happy to hear from anyone who has information about the Lemkins.

CJC rallied to keep Canada out of Berlin's 1936 Olympics

By DANNY ROSENBERG

During the last two weeks of August, most of the world's attention will be focused on the Olympic Games in Athens.

The deflection this event will create away from other global affairs and domestic problems and the political gains to be accrued by the country in which they are held are perceived benefits that were not lost on other cities and countries that have, in the past, hosted the greatest sport spectacle of the modern era.

The exploitation of sport to advance international political objectives was perfected in Nazi Germany, when Berlin hosted the XIth Olympiad in 1936. By that time, the Nuremberg Laws had been enacted, and Europe was nervously watching German expansion on many fronts. The Games were awarded to Germany by the International Olympic Committee (IOC) in 1933, the year Hitler came to power.

Thousands of Jews in several Canadian cities protested the anti-Jewish activities of the Nazis. However, the spread of anti-Semitism was not restricted to Germany.

The anti-Jewish climate in Canada had worsened in the 1920s and '30s, and that had a profound impact on the Jewish community. Efforts to warn the Canadian public about the dangers of German fascism and the growth of anti-Semitism at home led to requests throughout 1933 to reconstitute the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which had become inactive after holding one general meeting in 1919. When Congress reconvened in January 1934, it served as an umbrella body for local Jewish organizations throughout the country, although several important Jewish groups remained outside its fold.

According to historian Irving Abella, the main objectives of the new CJC were to lobby the Canadian government to allow more Jewish immigration, fight against anti-Semitism, support Jewish settlement in Palestine and fund Jewish communal activities.

Congress relied on a handful of Jewish elected officials in all three levels of government to educate non-Jewish politicians about the plight of Jews at home and abroad. Leaders in the Christian community were solicited for their support in combating anti-Semitism. Anti-defamation efforts were coordinated with labour and union organizations, as well as newly created anti-fascist groups.

The most aggressive scheme to emerge from the alliance was the decision to support the international boycott movement of German goods. As part of this campaign, between 1934 and 1936, the CJC tried to prevent Canadian participation in the 1936 Olympic Games in Berlin.

The first call to boycott the Nazi Olympics came from Canada's Communist Party, because it believed that "true sportsmanship" required peace and respect for human rights – two ideals it felt did not exist in Germany.

Archival documents from the CJC show that the Olympic Games were first mentioned in relation to the second international German boycott conference in Europe. In a letter to Congress dated July 3, 1934, Cyril Henrique, secretary of London's Jewish Representative Council, suggested that the CJC launch an "attack" on the Berlin Games. To pressure the Canadian Olympic Committee (COC) and other sport governing bodies, a strategy demonstrating that Jewish athletes would not receive fair treatment by the German regime was recommended. By the end of 1934, Congress was under the impression the strategy had paid off and the COC had decided Canada would not participate in the Berlin Games if there was discrimination against Jewish athletes from Germany.

Still, in the second half of 1935, efforts were stepped up in Canada, in line with opposition forces throughout the world, to halt decisions about participating in the Olympics. The Amateur Athletic Union of Canada (AAUC), whose support was needed by the COC, convened in Halifax in mid-November to make a final decision on Canada's entry or withdrawal from the Games. Most boycott appeals led up to this one crucial meeting to sway the vote against Olympic participation.

In August, CJC general secretary, Hannaniah Meier Caiserman, prepared reports of persecution against German Jewish sport organizations. The reports were taken to national level meetings of the AAUC.

Many Jewish communities in Canada knew about the Olympic boycott movement and Jews raised the issue locally. For example, in October, M.I. Lieberman of Edmonton met with Sgt. John Leslie, secretary of the AAUC and other important sport officials. Part of his letter to the head office of the CJC states, "I have Sgt. Leslie's assurance that he will vote against sending any Canadian athletes to the Olympic games in Germany."

A Hamilton rowing club sent out raffle tickets to raise money for the Olympics. When potential Jewish supporters were solicited, many sent the tickets back in protest.

In early November, a CJC archival letter indicates that Dr. M. Stitt, president of Lake Cities Lodge B'nai Brith, Fort William, Ont., served notice of motion against participation at the Olympics to the Thunder Bay Athletic Association.

Moses Finkelstein, president of the Western division of the CJC, met with members of the AAUC and expressed his frustration with those athletic officials who would not make public commitments against Canada's involvement in the Olympics.

Congress representatives Zimmerman and Levin presented the CJC's Olympic position before an executive meeting of the British Columbia Amateur Athletic Union in Vancouver.

Finally, Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple met with P.J. Mulqueen, president of the COC, to urge the leader of Canada's Olympic movement to boycott the Games. Of this meeting, Rabbi Eisendrath reported, "He was cordial and sympathetic, but diplomatically non-commital [sic]."

The CJC not only followed a national sport and athletic strategy in its Olympic boycott efforts, but it was also informed of or aligned to other boycott initiatives. For example, there was Canadian Jewish representation at American Amateur Athletic Union (AAAU) meetings, at which the boycott question was fiercely debated. The CJC was aware of the progress and details of those discussions. Congress was also asked to endorse the international boycott movement through the Paris-based International Committee on Fair Play in Sport.

Throughout October and November 1935, the CJC worked with labour unions, anti-fascist groups and religious bodies to specifically protest Canadian participation in the Berlin Olympics. At a Toronto Labour Anti-Nazi conference, a circular was sent to organizations throughout the city asking them to send wires to the AAUC's Halifax meeting, demanding that Canada boycott the Games. A resolution of the International Association of Machinists endorsed Winnipeg City Council's refusal to assist sending athletes to the Olympics.

All of the preceding examples indicate that the "official" voice of the Canadian Jewish community, the CJC, worked on a national and international scale, alone and with others, on behalf of the Olympic boycott movement. Unfortunately, Congress' message, together with the appeals of numerous organizations, did not make a significant impact, especially among those in the sport community. On November 21, 1935, in Halifax, the resolutions committee of the AAUC passed a motion unanimously, and with no discussion, that Canada follow the lead of Great Britain, whose Olympic committee decided in February to attend the Berlin Games.

By early 1936, the Olympic question was no longer a significant issue and only the general German boycott program was still pursued by the CJC. Canada would eventually send 100 athletes to Germany, including at least one Jewish athlete from Windsor who played on the silver medal-winning basketball team.

Two Jewish Olympic boxing hopefuls, Sammy Luftspring and Ben Yackubowitz, did boycott the Olympics by refusing to go to the national trials in Montreal. The CJC, in part, supported their attempt to participate at the International Workers' Olympics in Barcelona, but the anti-fascist games never came off due to the start of the Spanish Civil War.

Boycott of the Nazi Olympics failed in Canada, but what is remarkable is the extent and scope to which the CJC became involved in this campaign. Just six months after being reconstituted, it was already considering the call to boycott. When it joined the movement in earnest in 1935, Congress representatives across the country met with sport organizations, leaders of regional and national sport governing bodies, sports writers and government officials.

CJC efforts were co-ordinated with left-wing political groups (but not the Communist Party), labour organizations, educators and members of the clergy, Jewish and workers' sports clubs, and some international opposition committees.

Although the CJC did not take a visible lead in the boycott campaign, it played a vital role in the movement and recognized that the Nazi Olympics were part of the struggle against anti-Semitism at home and abroad.

Boycott of the Nazi Olympics failed in Canada

A rampant disease

David Mamet, the great American playwright, makes an important distinction between what he calls real and imaginary Jews.

In an article in Ron Rosenbaum's Those Who Forget The Past, a massive anthology of reflections about contemporary anti-Semitism, Mamet writes, "Imaginary Jews are the delight of the world. They include Anne Frank, Janusz Korczak, the Warsaw ghetto fighters, and the movie stars in Exodus."

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Perhaps Jesus the Jew should also be included in this list. It may explain why ardent Christians, often on the left, pass impressive resolutions in favour of Judaism in the abstract, yet are less than supportive of Jews in the flesh, particularly in Israel.

Mamet observes that imaginary Jews "delight the world in their willingness to die heroically as a form of entertainment." On the other hand, "the plight of actual Jews... has traditionally been more problematic."

Israel is about real Jews who are alive and determined to survive. Much of the hostility towards the Jewish state is due to this fact. Actual Israelis destroy the fantasy of imaginary forbears and fictitious contemporaries.

It is not easy to admit to a suspicion that the world prefers dead Jews to living Jews, especially if you believe that the western world should know better. Although Americans – perhaps also Canadians – still have such knowledge, travelling in Europe makes me wonder about the integrity of today's custodians of the cradle of western civilization.

The present worldwide revival of anti-Semitism may indeed be inspired by sinister forces in the Muslim world. However, the way this hatred has been embraced in Europe is ominous. Though anti-Semitism isn't state-sponsored as it was in Nazi Germany and still is in many Muslim countries, its prevalence in circles we thought knew better suggests that the disease of anti-Semitism has only been in remission in Europe. There is little evidence that it has ever been cured.

Medical terminology points to anti-Semitism as a disease of the non-Jewish world. Author and professor Bernard Lewis, arguably the foremost authority on the Middle East, says Muslims seem to have caught the disease from Europeans, and are using it for their own purposes. In its present mutation, anti-Semitism is as virulent and as dangerous as it was in the past.

Jews can help with the diagnosis and urge the patient to act on doctors' orders, but only the non-Jewish world can cure itself of the disease. Jews in Israel and the Diaspora can make sure they protect themselves as much as possible from the effects of this illness.

Mamet writes that "the western world is... deeply confused between the real and the imaginary." We must help it clear up the confusion – for its sake and for our own.

Au revoir, and thanks

It's been two years since I started writing this column, but I've only come a few inches closer to understanding who – and what – it is that I am.

As a secular Jew whose ties to the community were initially not as strong as I would have liked them to be, I have found that trying to strengthen them has been a complicated and extremely rewarding process.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

I now understand that being a Jew carries a sense of obligation. For some people, realizing that obligation means marrying a Jew, while for others it means keeping Shabbat and observing the Jewish holidays.

For me, I have discovered that my obligation lies in continuing to tell our stories, to use my pen to make up for my lack of Jewish education and experiences growing up. I want to help keep our stories alive for others who are looking in, to remember what has led us to where we are today.

Being a Jew isn't just about matzah balls, Hebrew, or a common genetic code.

Being a Jew is, however, an emotional experience, because of the baggage we carry and our shared history that is so rife with wrongdoing at the hands of other people.

It is often about the challenge of reconciling your future with not only the ghosts of your own past, but also with those of your parents, grandparents and even your great-grandparents.

It's about burden and heartache, but it's also about pride and resilience.

Most of all, it is about finding your place in the world and standing up for yourself at times when others may not – and often will not – always understand you.

I know that sometimes, I will still feel like an outsider among my fellow Jews – but I've come to accept that that's OK. After two years of making my foray into this new world, I won't be quite as cautious in the future about diving right in, and I won't feel the need to be politically correct about it.

I marvel at how far I've come in educating myself, and at what can happen with the passage of time. In a way, my columns have been like letters to myself in the future. In them, I have shared some of my most intimate and searing moments with you, my readers, and I have only become better for it.

Perhaps the best realization that I have come to is that out there, somewhere – indeed, practically anywhere – are people just like me, who feel the way I do, see the world the way I see it and continue to question, daily, who they are and what their obligations to the world and to their faith are.

Readers have have contacted me from as far away as Brazil and Israel, as well as from right here in Calgary or a stone's throw away in Edmonton.

I see my columns as an ongoing dialogue – about myself, about others and about the state of the world. I don't know where else I could have gotten such a marvelous experience or such a diverse education about what it means to be a Jew. There's nothing quite like the act of finding yourself when you get to do it in a public forum.

Thank you all for listening, for reading and for understanding when I expressed views not necessarily congruent with your own. Thanks for your e-mails, your encouragement and your kind words.

The time has come for me to move on – to other worlds and other ventures. This experience will always remain a large part of who I am and who I will become in the future. You, my readers, will also remain a part of me.

I hope that some day we will meet again.

In fact, I'm pretty sure we will.

The Israeli way

Last week, a would-be suicide bomber was within steps of a popular Jerusalem café when he turned around and decided not to become a shahid.

In addition to the dynamite strapped around his waist, he had a gun. He planned to shoot the security guard standing at the café's entrance and then run into the shop, so as to kill as many people as possible.

We will never know why this man turned around, because he was killed in gunfire when the Israel Defence Forces invaded the house in which he was staying.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

I have been in Jerusalem for a month now, and I admit that this would-be suicide bomber caught me off-guard.

When I first arrived here, I was very much a Canadian on Israeli soil. As I sat on the patio of a bar, I couldn't help but keep my eyes on the people walking by, rather than on my boyfriend sitting across the table. I was nervous.

I am working at a think-tank, so in addition to the fact that the news is all about the security fence, my days are also filled with the details of the arguments about the fence, since I am editing a soon-to-be-published article on the fence, written by a lawyer, Justus Weiner.

As the UN passes yet another resolution, I can confidently say that the countries who speak against Israel and the fence without bothering to take a look at what's going on are not on moral high ground.

Last May and June, when I spent two months in Israel, it was a different time. The bus that went through the Jerusalem neighbourhood in which I lived was blown up, killing and injuring many.

A good friend of mine took that bus every day – from the Jerusalem Post, where he was an intern, to the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies, which we both attended. Thankfully, he wasn't on the bus the day it blew up, but it was a close enough call for me to understand what was going on.

The successes of the fence, despite its failings, are evident to anyone on the streets.

This summer, the atmosphere in Jerusalem has changed. The streets are filled with tour buses, and you can't go anywhere in the city without running into one of the many Birthright tour groups. Ben-Yehuda Street is jammed every night with a food festival.

I think it is fair to say that no one is surprised by the hypocrisy of the International Court of Justice (ICJ). The judgment against Israel was implicit in the question the United Nations originally submitted to the international court.

As well, the fact that so many nations objected to the court's jurisdiction on the issue, an issue which is political rather than legal, doesn't seem to have influenced the countries that voted the court's recommendation into a new UN Resolution.

None of this comes as a shock, yet when one stops for a moment to think about the situation, it's hard to comprehend.

I always fear appealing to anti-Semitism as an explanation of international responses to Israel. I want to believe that underlying even the most irrational responses to Israel, there is some justification that cannot be reduced to anti-Semitism.

However, as the international community persists in failing to recognize the severity of the terrorist threat Israel is facing, it becomes increasingly difficult to understand why Israel is subject to constant criticism, while human rights abuses and violations of international law continue throughout the world with no response.

One need only look to the recent judgment of Israel's High Court of Justice, in which the defence ministry was ordered to reroute some 30 kilometres of the security fence, to understand that Israel does not need external castigations to assume an introspective stance and faithfully evaluate policy and procedure.

Whatever the political situation is, the one thing that never changes, especially on the streets of Jerusalem, is the willingness of Israelis to debate, discuss, and consider politics and policy in a way that only Israelis can – with absolute honesty and no ulterior motives.

That's the Israeli way.

Cheddi and Janet Jagan: Guyana's odd couple

Politics should definitely be in Nadira Jagan-Brancier's blood, given her distinguished pedigree. As the daughter of two former presidents of Guyana – a developing country situated on the northern coast of South America – she ought to be fixated by politics.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Yet curiously enough, politics hardly inspires her, at least on a purely personal level.

"I was never involved in politics," said Jagan-Brancier, a 48-year-old jeweller who lives in the rustic Ontario town of Milton with her husband and two teenage children. "I don't get into politics."

Yet Jagan-Brancier has enormous respect for her parents, Cheddi and Janet (née Rosenberg), and basically agrees with their left-wing views.

She runs a website dedicated in their honour (www.Jagan.org). She has written a self-published book about her late father, Cheddi Jagan: My Fight for Guyana's Freedom. And thanks to the support of a network of friends, she and her mother have established a non-profit institution – the Cheddi Jagan Center – in Georgetown, Guyana's capital, to promote and perpetuate his socialist ideas.

"I want them to live on," she explained. "He was a great man. He fought for Guyana's independence, the rights of the poor and universal suffrage."

By most standards, Jagan, an East Indian, and Janet, an American Jew – the subjects of Suzanne Wasserman's intriguing biopic Thunder in Guyana, which was screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival – were certainly an odd couple.

They met at Wayne State University in the early 1940s, when they were both students and idealistic radicals and Guyana was still a European colony known as British Guiana.

The only British imperial outpost in South America, it was settled by the Dutch in the late 16th century and wrested away by the British in 1831. A multiracial hodgepodge consisting of East Indians, Africans, Amerindians, Portuguese, Chinese and people of mixed race, British Guiana was granted independence in 1966.

But long before this physically spectacular but economically impoverished nation achieved statehood, the Jagans were doggedly fighting for that objective.

They could not have been more different in terms of upbringing and race.

Jagan was the son of hard-working Hindus who struggled to eke out a living on a sugar plantation. Janet, born in Chicago, was raised in a leafy middle-class neighbourhood. When she was a young woman, she took flying lessons, a luxury the Jagans could scarcely have afforded.

Wasserman, Janet's younger cousin, does not explain why and when the pair embraced Marxism. But their identical political beliefs must have been an integral factor in cementing their romance.

Janet's conventionally conservative parents opposed their marriage – so much so that her father, Charlie, threatened to shoot Jagan on sight. Janet, however, was not intimidated. "Nothing much frightened me," she observes in Thunder in Guyana.

They arrived in British Guiana in 1943, when World War II was raging. Janet's presence in Jagan's family circle caused shock waves. What was a nice Jewish girl doing in a tropical backwater like this?

Initially, they attempted to organize poorly paid sugar workers. But when they realized they could be more effective as politicians, the Jagans threw themselves into the struggle for national independence.

In 1950, they established the People's Progressive Party, British Guiana's first modern political party. Three years later, at the height of the McCarthyist era in the United States, Jagan was elected chief minister, while Janet was elected deputy speaker of parliament. Being the first Marxist leader in the western hemisphere, Jagan was viewed suspiciously by Britain and the United States.

Deposed by Britain after 133 days, the Jagans were summarily arrested, spending the next six months in prison. But in 1957, they were back as government ministers, working to eradicate malaria and obtain vacation pay for the toiling masses. By then, the United States had revoked her citizenship.

When Jagan was elected prime minister in 1961, Janet was widely regarded as his eminence grise. "Mom would be blamed if people didn't like dad's policy," said Jagan-Brancier, who was twice beaten up by classmates during this period. "She was a scapegoat, and the opposition used racial obscenities and slurs against her."

Some adversaries went so far as to link her to American atomic spies Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, to whom she was not related.

In one of his first steps as president, Jagan travelled to the United States to try to convince U.S. President John F. Kennedy to support Guiana's bid for sovereignty. But he failed, Kennedy being suspicious of his views.

Several years later, in 1964, Forbes Burnham, Jagan's former ally, defeated him in what was widely considered a rigged election. In opposition, the Jagans were mistreated by Burnham, Jagan-Brancier said. "My father was treated like dirt," she comments in the film. When Janet wanted to make a speech in parliament, Burnham would say, "Sit down, you stupid American."

Jagan roared back to power in 1992 in what, Thunder in Guyana claims, was the first free and fair election in Guyana's history. He died on March 6, 1997 of a heart attack.

A new election was called and Janet, the editor of Thunder – the official organ of the People's Progressive Party – and a person who considered herself a freedom fighter, was asked to campaign for the presidency.

"She didn't really want to run for president," recalled Jagan-Brancier, saying her mother has never craved or enjoyed the limelight. "But she felt it was her duty."

It was a close election, but Janet won, becoming Guyana's first Jewish, foreign-born, female president, and reportedly the first American woman to be elected president of a foreign country.

Local newspapers dubbed her "Bubbe of Guyana" and "Mother of the Nation."

Felled by a heart attack herself, Janet was forced to resign 20 months into her presidency.

"She regretted having to give up the office. Basically, she carried on dad's policy. She had been quite ill before winning the election. The job would have killed her."

In Jagan-Brancier's estimation, Thunder in Guyana is an accurate portrayal of her parents. "It's a good overview."

But there are gaps.

"My mother has been a children's book writer and political journalist for most of her life, and that doesn't come out."

And her commitment to women's and children's rights, for which she was awarded a United Nations medal, is omitted as well.

Although Wasserman alludes to it early on, Janet's Jewish background is also peripheral in the film.

"It's not played a big part in her life," said Jagan-Brancier. "We're not a religious family, but we're not anti-religious either. My brother and I were not brought up Jewish. Basically, I'm an atheist."

Janet, who turns 84 in October, has since recovered from her heart attack. "But she still has a lot of health problems."

These days, she occupies herself with party affairs a couple of times a week and works on Guyana's national art collection.

"Art is one of her passions," explained Jagan-Brancier, who studied jewelry design in Guyana and was then a jeweller apprentice in Los Angeles.

That was where she met her husband, Mark, a gemologist, in 1981. They moved to Milton the following year and have resided there ever since.

Though they live thousands of kilometres and a continent apart, she and her mother are in constant touch. Janet is a regular visitor to Milton, just west of Toronto, but she finds it quite boring.

Just as attached to Guyana as her mother, Jagan-Brancier visits Georgetown once or twice a year. "I like the weather better there. I never became accustomed to the cold. And I prefer the way of life in Guyana. Here you work and work. There the pace is slower. Not everyone is running all the time."

She doubts whether she will ever return permanently. "I would still like to live in Guyana, but unfortunately, it won't happen. We have a business here, and my husband wouldn't want to start over again."

As for her famous mother, Jagan-Brancier is quite sure she is in Guyana to stay.

"She would never leave Guyana."

Jewish Life

Genealogy as a labour of love

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

"I'm working on a book of family history," Sara Edell Kelman declares, as she shows me her massive collection of archival documents, ketubot, photographs, Yiddish letters and other family memorabilia, spilling out of diverse albums, binders and boxes. "No, it's more than one book – it's a series of books. There's a lot of stuff here, and it's sprouting wings and branches on all sides."

A noted genealogist who lived in Chicago and Boston for years, the former Sara Edell Schafler returned to the city of her birth four years ago to become the wife of Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda congregation. A former president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Boston, she has numerous research projects on the go, all involving aspects of Toronto's Jewish community.

Born in Toronto in 1928, she attended the Brunswick Talmud Torah, Harbord Collegiate and the University of Toronto before leaving for New York in 1949 to study at the Jewish Theological Seminary. Then she and her former husband, the late Rabbi Sam Schafler, raised a brood of kids. Only in retrospect did she realize that her children would know practically nothing of her family's long association with Toronto.

Kelman's grandfather, Rabbi Joseph Weinreb, was an impressive figure in the community's early days. Before the turn of the century, when he was still in Europe, the Shomrai Shabbos congregation sent him a letter, offering a pulpit. He arrived in Toronto in 1900, became known as the Galitzianer Rav, and served as a rabbi here for more than 40 years.

In 1980, during one of her frequent visits to the city, Kelman took a highly nostalgic walking tour led by archivist-historian Stephen Speisman. Afterwards, she read Speisman's book, The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, and discovered details about her grandfather she hadn't known before. While she had always believed he had come from Pamorin (Pamoryzany), according to Speisman, the illustrious rav was working in Jasi, Roumania, when he received the Toronto invitation.

Questions began to gnaw away at her. How long had he been in Jasi? Where did the family come from before that? Who was her great-grandmother, after whom she'd been named? "I felt guilty that I never asked my mother or grandfather about her. What did she look like, what was she like? I began to think about those things, the things I didn't record. These people have a right to be remembered."

Bitten by the genealogical bug, she interviewed elderly relatives, traipsed through cemeteries and visited libraries and archives from Salt Lake City to Poland, Jasi to Jerusalem. And by a fluke, she found a relative in Haifa who told her stories about her great-grandmother. "I found out about my namesake from this lady, Tirzah. She told me stories that were irreplaceable."

Love of Jewish genealogy and history may be in Kelman's genes. Her late brother, Sol Edell, was a dedicated amateur historian-archivist who helped establish the Ontario Jewish Archives. And nephew Yale Reisner is chief archivist of the Ronald Lauder Genealogical Project at the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw.

Nearly a quarter-century into her quest, having traced some ancestral lines back to the 1740s, Kelman expresses amazement "that I was able to recover so much, so late, when everybody was gone." Like many of us, she's now faced with the formidable challenge of publishing her findings for future generations.

She flips through an impressively thick batch of papers – a partial first draft of a manuscript that she's been working on for a long time. "I've put so much work into this that I want it to be preserved," she declares. "I want it to be in a unit that you can hold in your hands." And so, with help from Above, her labour of love continues.

Religion and state must remain separate

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

I believe in the separation of church and state. Call me a liberal if you wish, but I have always felt that the less a government involves itself in matters of religion and faith the better. I am not naïve in believing that there could be a clear defining line between the two.

Here in Canada, while we try to separate the two, the line often manages to become fuzzy and even blurred. Take Sunday laws, for instance, or the government funding of Catholic schools, for another. However, at the end of the day, the fact remains that the government sees itself as having no business in the way people worship.

The State of Israel is a secular state. As much as we may fantasize that it is a Jewish state, it is, and until the coming of the Messiah, will remain a secular democracy. As such, the State of Israel, just like any other democracy, grapples with the sensitive issue of separation of church and state.

Small and large steps have been taken towards this separation (for instance, this year's abolition of the ministry of religion). These necessary moves have never been easy. I say necessary, and use a case currently before the Jerusalem city council to illustrate my point.

There is a motion before the city council to disallow permits for the construction of a synagogue in the capital's neighbourhood of Givaat Masua. The petition was brought forth by the Shiniu party, representing some 30 opposing families. The grounds for opposition are not based on zoning, on regulation or on any other municipal bylaws; they are totally based on the fact that this building will house a synagogue.

The opposing parties are basing their stands on another judgment by the Israeli Supreme Court. It seems that awhile ago, a butcher shop wished to open in order to sell bassar lavan – literally, white meat – to the public. Bassar lavan is the Israeli euphemism for pork. This butcher also faced opposition, and the establishment's right to open was brought before the Supreme Court.

In that case the court ruled that the nature and sensitivities of a neighbourhood must be taken into account, as well as any other viable alternative. In that case, those wishing to buy their ham had to find it elsewhere. In the case of the synagogue the argument is that those who are wishing to pray should do so elsewhere.

No matter how well-meaning such suggestions may be, I don't believe God either intended or desires us to have laws of government support His religion, whether in stopping the consumption of pork or in disallowing the construction of a house of worship. Don't get me wrong, I cringe as much as the next person at the idea that bacon and pork chops are offered for sale in Jerusalem. But stopping a shop from opening is not the same as stopping consumption of pork.

That God created man in His image is understood to mean that man is given the right to choose. Only when that right is exercised freely and, hopefully, correctly does it have any meaning or significance to God. If we do or don't do something because it is the law of man, then we don't follow religion but rather man's law.

I for one would leave the purveyors of pork alone and leave the builders of the synagogue alone, and I would give the people the freedom of choice to frequent one or the other. And if this makes me a liberal, then so be it.

Jewish Life

The Orthodox viewpoint

Contemporary Orthodox Judaism's Response to Modernity by Barry Frundel, KTAV Publishing, $22.95 US.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In this readable volume of relatively brief essays, the author, who is the rabbi of a modern Orthodox congregation in Washington, D.C., and an expert on Jewish ethics, summarizes 31 diverse teachings. These topics range from God, prophecy and gentiles to miracles, afterlife, women, conversion and the Holocaust.

The question at the heart of the challenging problem of evil is, "How can I remain Jewish or believe in God after the Holocaust?" The author responds that he has never understood the cogency of the question, "If God does not exist, does the problem get any easier? Indeed, it seems to me to get harder, at least in an emotional sense. With God in the equation, the possibility of an explanation exists. Without God, we have an uncaring universe. Everything that occurs is random and without purpose. Is that really a better or more satisfying answer? At least when we acknowledge the existence of God, there is some address at which to hurl the challenge, and one can demand an explanation."

The essay on gentiles discusses various forms of paganism in the ancient world and in our own time. Judaism, of course, was unalterably opposed to the idolatry of the Bible, with its human sacrifice, bodily mutilation and fertility rituals. Maimonides taught that it was the belief in multiple gods that defined an idolater. On this basis, he believed Islam was not idolatrous. Other Jewish authorities made a similar determination about Christianity, which has moved from Trinitarian expressions that saw the father deity, the son deity, and the spirit deity as three separate entities to more unitarian expressions that see all three as different manifestations of the same single God. Over the centuries, the unitarian approach has come to be the dominant Christian understanding of the Godhead.

What about the belief in an afterlife? The author is convinced that the most widely held inaccurate idea about Judaism is that it doesn't accept the idea of immortality. On the contrary, Rabbi Freundel affirms the belief is well established, although there are no references to it in the Torah. It is a concept that developed in the later rabbinic period and was upheld by the Pharisees. It is true the entire notion is not widely discussed among Jews, largely because the Jewish emphasis is on this world rather than the world to come.

Are there dangers in the current popularity of mysticism? The author warns that "spirituality must be lived and pursued constantly; it cannot be turned on and off like a light switch. Also, false momentary highs raise expectations and may leave a person with no place to go for follow up. That type of experience can 'turn off' far more than it 'turns on.'"

He cautions that false and exaggerated mystical teachings led to the tragedies of the false messiah Shabtai Zvi and the charlatan Jacob Frank.

When is a person to be considered dead? Some traditional rabbis assert that a brain-dead person on life-support should be unhooked from the respirator and buried. To not do so is to violate the Torah's prohibition of delayed burial, which is tantamount to disrespecting the dead. On the other hand, some rabbis believe doing so would be an act of murder.

Rabbi Freundel is a good teacher – clear, fair, intelligent and knowledgeable about halachic sources.

Of course, less traditional Jews will find his approach informative and helpful, but not definitive or conclusive.

Jews and the Olympics – Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began to look at the Olympics and the successes that Jewish and Israeli athletes have enjoyed in competition – and the pain they have suffered along the way. This week, rather than sports and politics, we'll look at another, sometimes difficult relationship: sports and religion. But first, Jewish Athens for the real – and the virtual – tourist.

If you plan to be in Athens for the Olympics, you won't have to go without kosher food. The KosherAthens site has information about availability of kosher food and the city's kosher restaurant, as well as the city's synagogues, Jewish sites and mikvah. [www.kosherathens.com/] Chabad of Greece will try to help you with Shabbat hospitality. [www.chabad.gr/] And you can brush up on the history of the 2,400-year-old Jewish presence in Greece in an essay written by the founder of that country's Jewish Museum. [www.greecetravel.com/jewishhistory/] For much more about the country, surf through the links on the Jews of Greece page. [www.haruth.com/JewsGreece.html]

When the Games end, Athens will have three weeks to catch its breath before it welcomes its next set of athletes and visitors. They'll be coming to be part of an elite competition – with Jewish roots. On Sept. 17, Greece hosts the world's top athletes with disabilities at the Paralympics. [http://tinyurl.com/23yk5] The idea for these Games came from Sir Ludwig Guttmann, Guttmann, a Jew, was a neurosurgeon in Breslau before fleeing to England in 1939. He came up with the idea for the games while working at the National Spinal Injuries Centre at Stoke-Mandeville near London. You can read more about him at the Jews in Sports website. [www.jewishsports.net/BioPages/LudwigPoppaGuttmann.htm] Israel is a veteran participant at these Games. In fact, Tel Aviv hosted the third Paralympic Games back in 1968. [http://paralympic.org/games/1968/]

Despite the media frenzy that always surrounds the Olympics, not everyone has been caught up in the hype. In his essay on "Why the Olympic Spirit Lacks a Jewish Neshama," Eliezer Segal suggests that historically, Judaism has always looked upon organized sport with a somewhat jaundiced eye."Whereas Jewish objections to Greek sports were primarily due to their inherently pagan character (as well as to their immodesty and frivolity), the Romans introduced a new dimension to the arena: cruelty which even surpassed that of professional hockey." One notable exception was Israel's first chief rabbi, Abraham Isaac Kook, who believed in the importance of maintaining a healthy mind in a healthy body. That is, as long at the healthy body would permit Jews to better perform their religious duties. [www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/870901_Olympic.html]

In "Olympics & Kavanah," Richard Greenberg draws a parallel between the intense concentration that athletes use to visualize their goals and the kavanah, (focus) used in the performance of mitzvot and the recitation of prayer. However, Greenberg concludes by drawing a distinction between sports and Judaism. "In sports, winning is everything. But in Judaism, trying your very best can also get you to the medal stand." [www.aish.com/spirituality/prayer/Olympics_and_Kavanah.asp]

I'll leave the last word to Rabbi Mitch Smith, a Reconstructionist rabbi in St. Petersburg, Fla., and a certified sports psychologist who has worked with Israeli national teams. "To be the very best in life, we can take our cue from the gold medal athletes. If we dream dreams for ourselves, if we summon the dedication and commitment to those dreams and take the steps necessary to achieve them, if we take responsibility for our circumstances and summon the positive thoughts and self-confidence, if we define success on our own terms and not those which society dictates, and if we cast our portion with something larger than ourselves, then we can hold our head proudly as we take our place on the gold medal podium of life." [www.jewishsports.com/reflections/struggold.htm]

Seminar aims to put Toronto in the Yiddish big leagues

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

If you think Yiddish is a dying language in Toronto, a program running from Aug. 16 to Sept. 3 at the Miles Nadal JCC just might change your mind.

Toronto's First Annual Yiddish Seminar, which will offer Yiddish programs for beginners and advanced students, is modelled after successful Yiddish programs around the world that are attracting both young and old.

Mitch Smolkin and his wife Sylwia Szymanska-Smolkin are co-directors of the seminar, which will feature Abraham Maximo Lichtenbaum, a world authority in Yiddish language and literature.

Lichtenbaum, who lives in Argentina, is executive director of the Yiddish Scientific Institute (YIVO) in Buenos Aires. He has presented workshops at Columbia University and the University of Vilnius in Lithuania and has made more than 1,000 appearances at cultural institutions in Argentina and around the world.

"The Yiddish seminar is built on a dream," says Smolkin, who is the artistic director of the Ashkenaz Foundation and Festival. "This seminar will lay the groundwork for a full-fledged summer program in the future."

He says that with two Yiddish programs in Toronto – at the University of Toronto and York University – "the city is ripe for an international summer seminar that will show off our great appreciation in Toronto for the Yiddish language."

The program features a one-day Yiddish marathon for absolute beginners on Sunday, Aug. 29, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Its goal is to prepare participants for the beginners Yiddish one-week seminar, to be held from Monday to Friday, Aug. 30 to Sept. 3.

This one-week intensive program will covers basic elements of the Yiddish language and will be taught by Gloria Bruemer. It will include basic grammar and conversation, and use Yiddish songs and films to introduce participants to the sound and shape of the language.

For advanced students, there is a three-week seminar with Lichtenbaum that runs from Aug. 16 to Sept 3. It will examine the works of such luminaries as Isaac Bashevis Singer, Sholem Asch, Abraham Sutskever and Itsik Manger, as well as modern Yiddish poetry.

There will also be afternoon Ashkenaz cultural workshops at the Miles Nadal JCC from Aug. 30 to Sept. 3 that will feature guest lecturers, music and film.

Smolkin, a graduate of U of T's drama program who focused on acting and singing, has studied Yiddish at U of T, Columbia and in Vilnius.

He notes that over the past few decades, Yiddish has come to represent not only the language of Ashkenazi Jews, but an identity in and of itself.

"Throughout the world and in major centres, students gather from around the world to study Yiddish and its cultural context and history. The irony is that the current body of scholars and lay students are from all backgrounds, not only Jewish."

Szymanska-Smolkin notes that Yiddish scholars and enthusiasts have a tremendous resource in this city.

"We have the opportunity to communicate with those people in our society who have learned Yiddish as their mamaloshen," says Szymanska-Smolkin, who earned an MA at the Historical Institute at Warsaw University with a thesis titled The Jewish population of Otwock during World War II. She has worked as a historian and translator at the Institute of National Remembrance in Warsaw and taught Yiddish at Warsaw University.

"We need to expose as many people as possible to Yiddish in order to continue in the Jewish tradition of oral learning, and not take for granted an immensely valuable treasure of our current Jewish community," she says.

Palestinian intimidation of journalists: an untold story

Israel receives far more critical media attention than any of its neighbours. This is largely because, as the sole democracy in the Middle East, Israel allows a free and vigorous media to operate, often to its detriment. But that is the price Israel pays for having an open society, and hosting the largest per capita concentration of journalists in the world.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the Arab world, journalists are greatly constrained – either by direct threats or through more subtle forms of intimidation – from shedding light on issues Arab rulers would prefer to keep hidden from international attention.

This disparity in media coverage is rarely mentioned by journalists in their reports, although they will discuss it in private. The unwillingness to air the subject publicly is also part of the climate of repression – a form of intimidation that has worked for decades in the Arab world, where journalists vie for visas and access to officials who do not look kindly on those who disobey the rules of the game.

It is against this background that Matthew Kalman's article, "Defiant Arafat reasserts grip on power" (Globe and Mail, July 21), appears as a revelation. Reporting on the crisis in Arafat's rule, Kalman wrote: "But the most troubling aspect of Mr. Arafat's reassertion of control was a warning to Palestinian journalists to cease all coverage of the kind of street protests that rocked the Gaza Strip and some West Bank cities last weekend. Reporters have also been threatened with severe punishment if they depict clashes between rival groups in the Gaza Strip, such as the gunfight in Rafah that injured 12 people on Sunday [July 18].

"The ban effectively prevents international news outlets from covering these events, since they depend on Palestinian photographers, reporters and editors to produce news footage and written copy for broadcasters, print and wire services."

The last time such intimidation happened, Kalman wrote, "was in September of 2001, when Palestinian reporters were forced to suppress images of huge street celebrations in Nablus and Bethlehem after the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington. International news bureau chiefs for wire services including Reuters and Associated Press were warned that their cameramen would be in danger if their footage was broadcast in the West."

The threats in 2001 largely worked. The CBC's Neil Macdonald was one of the only Western correspondents to get these images on air and, unknown to viewers, he was subsequently threatened. A Palestinian cameraman working for AP received a death threat. Fearing for his life, AP withheld tapes of the street celebrations.

Kalman reported that the latest threats were "issued through the Palestinian Journalists' Syndicate, a quasi-trade union controlled by Arafat loyalists."

On July 24, when Arafat spoke publicly in Ramallah for the first time since the protests began, Kalman reported for CTV's national newscast (the Globe and CTV are both owned by Bell Globemedia). He may have been the only correspondent in the world to air Arafat's plea for "one million martyrs to march on Jerusalem" – a well-known call for the continuation of suicide bombings and ultimately for the destruction of Israel.

Reporting from Ramallah, Kalman said: "[Arafat's] critics are demanding reforms and an end to corruption in his administration. But he spoke about the struggle against Israel rather than the battle for democracy at home."

If only more journalists displayed the same courage and commitment to their craft, despite intimidating tactics aimed at getting them to suppress crucial stories.

Thornhill resident competes in Miss Teen Canada pageant

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

At 13 and at 14 years old, Elise Goodman auditioned for the National Ballet School in Toronto, and both times the selection committee told her she was too tall for ballet.

Now five feet 10 inches tall, Goodman, 18, has been named Miss Teen Thornhill by the Miss Teen Canada International organization and her height isn't an issue.

On Aug. 28, she goes up against 39 other delegates from across Canada for the title of Miss Teen Canada International 2005.

The winner of the pageant receives a university scholarship as well as the opportunity to share her message and travel around Canada, Goodman said.

The positive message she would like to share with other teens is that "organized, constructive activity is the key to lower rates of violence, drug abuse and gang involvement," she said.

Goodman, who is busy with ballet, school and volunteering, said she has seen the positive effects in her own life.

Elise Goodman, who takes part in the Miss Teen Canada International pageant next month, has received the William Kagan Award for youth volunteer work.

For the Miss Teen Canada application process, Goodman wrote an essay about why Canada is such a great place to live, she was interviewed, and she submitted reference letters, an autobiography and her school marks.

The Miss Teen Canada International organization accepts applicants from across Canada who have good grades, talent, strong community involvement and a sense of sportsmanship.

Unlike other pageants, this one isn't about looks.

"It's not based on beauty, it's based on being a good role model," Goodman said. "It's a good way to portray a positive message to kids my own age."

Goodman said she's always been interested in being a role model and her family and friends know that.

"Everybody's really excited and supportive," she said.

The Miss Teen Canada pageant, which doesn't have a swimsuit competition, is non-profit, so each delegate must find a sponsor to cover her costs, including hotel accommodation and food. All the delegates are provided with dresses in case they don't have the means to buy one.

Goodman said her own role model is her mother, Ruth. "I really look up to my mom. We have a really big (extended) family and she's always been very supportive of everyone. She's very strong, no matter what has happened. She has a strong work ethic and she's very determined."

Goodman's mother has worked at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care for the past 17 years.

"She's always brought me with her, but I wasn't allowed to volunteer there until I was 13," she said.

Goodman currently has more than 500 volunteer hours from Baycrest, and in June she received the William Kagan Award for youth volunteer work.

She works with cognitively impaired seniors in the behavioural neurology unit at Baycrest and has helped establish a movement-to-music program there, for which she used her dance training.

"It was a challenge, but the program is very successful," she said.

Goodman has been dancing since she was four years old and has won several awards. She continues to take lessons and participates in ballet productions with the Canadian Ballet Theatre.

"We do Nutcracker, Swan Lake and Giselle," she said.

Her other hobbies include painting, theatre and playing tennis.

Goodman recently graduated from Langstaff Secondary School's French-immersion program as an honour-roll student and will attend York University this fall to study French.

"I'm hoping to go to law school eventually," she said. "I'm leaning towards being a lawyer, but I'll always have the dancing."

Starting Aug. 20, the 40 Miss Teen Canada delegates from across Canada will spend 10 days together in Mississauga. They'll take tests in math, English and geography, work on a talent portion for the show, tour the city and do interviews.

To prepare for the big event, Goodman has been practising the ballet dance she will perform and has just finished writing a short autobiography about her achievements, awards and extra-curricular activities.

Most of the judging is done before the event, Goodman said, but Miss Teen Canada hopefuls find out the competition results on the night of the pageant.

Goodman said she hopes to win the competition and become Miss Teen Canada International 2005 because she would love to represent Thornhill and other young people her age.

"I have a really positive message," she said, adding that it would be an honour to be a role model.

המארח מתקרב לאוזנו ולוחש לו: "לחגיד לך את האמת- שכחתי את השם שלה לפני עשר שנים ומאז אני קורא לה 'מותק' ו'חאני"....

Producer seeks Jewish families for new reality TV series

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — A B.C. television producer is seeking Jewish families in the Lower Mainland to take part in a new documentary reality series.

The 13-part series, called The Mazel Tov Chronicles, will feature some of the simchot celebrated by families in the Vancouver Jewish community.

Daniel Leipnik, president of Vancouver-based production company Vibrance Alive Entertainment Inc., says he will start filming bar mitzvahs and weddings, as well as Pesach, Purim and Sukkot celebrations in September.

Leipnik says he is looking for a wide range of lively, expressive families, from observant to liberal, who are willing to invite his production company into their living rooms, kitchens and wedding reception halls to record their celebrations on film.

The Mazel Tov Chronicles will be "host-driven," Leipnik says.

"We are looking for a female host, somebody who's outlandish and over the top, who will get involved with the families and act as a guide for the audience," he says. "The host will make the series fun and enjoyable, so that anybody, no matter how little they know about Judaism, will enjoy it."

Leipnik says he is looking for a female host, because much of the preparation for Jewish celebrations is done by women.

He hopes the series will act as an antidote to Israel-bashing and anti-Semitism by showing "how joyously beautiful" Jewish religion and culture is.

"Hopefully... people of all walks [of life] will watch the series and come to know a little more about Judaism so that education, in this instance, can create tolerance and understanding," Leipnik says.

The Mazel Tov Chronicles will be carried on Vancouver-based Channel M (Cable 8), a multicultural station that broadcasts programming in more than 20 languages.

Channel M's vice-president of programming Johnny Michel, who lived in Jerusalem for 18 years, says he wants to show the rich religious and cultural traditions of Judaism in the program.

"Many people in Canada don't know much about Judaism and have a negative viewpoint because of the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians," Michel says. "We hope the program will correct that."

Rabbi David Mivasair, spiritual leader of Congregation Ahavat Olam in Vancouver, is acting as an unofficial consultant to Vibrance Alive.

Originally from Melbourne, Australia, Leipnik came to Vancouver seven years ago when he was an international trade management consultant who helped Australian companies develop export strategies.

"When I got here, I discovered the film industry and decided to become an independent producer," he says.

Earlier Vibrance Alive TV projects include My Mother, My Hero, a 10-part half-hour program about how the Holocaust shaped mother-child relationships, and Out On TV, a 26-episode gay and lesbian magazine news show.

Families that want to speak to Leipnik about taking part in The Mazel Tov Chronicles can reach him at 604-709-8098 or at daniel@vibrancealive.com.

Melchior to help launch Winnipeg CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Labor-Meimad MK Rabbi Michael Melchior will be on hand to help kick off the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal's 2004 campaign on Sept. 7.

Rabbi Melchior was named Israel's ambassador to Diaspora Jewry by the government of former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak. As a result, said Bob Freedman, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's executive director, Melchior is in high demand as a speaker at European and North American Jewish events.

"I have heard a lot of speakers over the years, and Rabbi Melchior is one of the greatest. He is unbelievable," Freedman said, adding that Winnipeg is the only North American community Rabbi Melchior will be visiting on his trip.

The grandson of a former chief rabbi of Denmark, Rabbi Melchior became involved in Israeli politics through the moderately Orthodox Meimad Party, which elected him as its chairman in 1998.

After the 1999 election, Rabbi Melchior led Meimad into Barak's Labor-led coalition government and was appointed to a newly created ministerial post responsible for relations between Israel and the Diaspora. With the formation of a national unity government after the 2001 election, he also became Deputy Foreign Affairs Minister.

In the current Knesset, he chairs the children's rights committee and co-chairs the Jewish-Arab coexistence and environmental affairs caucuses.

Outside his Knesset responsibilities, Rabbi Melchior has been head of the Birthright Israel steering committee and founded the International Commission to Combat Anti-Semitism.

He is also a leader in interfaith dialogue and helped convene the Alexandria Summit of Religious Leaders in January 2002. He has received the Sovlanut Prize for promoting tolerance in Israel and the Coventry Peace Prize in England for his efforts in working toward peace.

Freedman said the goal of this year's CJA campaign is $4.5 million, an increase of $200,000 over last year.

"We are working in a very competitive field and there is ever-increasing pressure from our beneficiaries for more funding," he said. "Nonetheless, we are optimistic that we can achieve our target. After all, we have met and exceeded our goals in each of the last four years."

YOU CAN'T PUT A BANDAGE ON TERRORISM

But you can help us try to stop the bleeding.

Within seconds, a terrorist strike in Jerusalem can cause devastating losses and massive injuries. Within minutes, victims arrive at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center. Shaare Zedek is overburdened by growing demand for its life-saving emergency care. A new 32,300 square foot Emergency Department, opening this year, will become Jerusalem's premier emergency facility. But equipment costs and other critical needs still outweigh the resources.

You can't put a bandage on terrorism. But you can help us save lives.

Ambassador bids farewell; completes tour of duty

An Israeli ambassador, he said, must be both a diplomat and a marketer for the State of Israel.

"As a marketer, we have to put things in their proper context. We have to be able to develop a strategy for imparting the information that will strike a responsive nerve with the Canadian public to show Canadians that there is a state out there [Israel] that most average Canadians do not see. There is a state beyond the constant barrage of negative images. Six million people get up every day, go to work, or go to school, and lead lives of family, business, social and other pressures, much like in most other places in the world.

"There is no doubt that the medium of television has had an impact on the [Mideast] conflict. What can the television show in 20 seconds? The journalist on the spot delivers what his producer wants him to. The camera shows the demolition of the home. It does not show the smuggling of the rockets, the guns and the bomb belts through the tunnels underneath those homes.

"We must provide the background information that explains what the camera shows. If the source of the public's information is only what they see on television, then the public will be very badly informed.

"It is our job to bring the story of Israel and its people to the people of Canada. Sometimes that story shows imperfections in Israeli society. Like all peoples around the world, we too make mistakes. And we have to explain them honestly."

An earnest speaker, Divon often uses his hands to punctuate his thoughts, and he always seems to be searching for just the right word to capture the full nuance of what he is trying to say.

"My role as a diplomat and as ambassador," he said, "is to find pragmatic ways, each day, to be of assistance to my country, to be ready at any given time to promote good relations and better understanding between our two countries."

He elaborated: "For example, I was able to convince Canadian businessmen to visit Israel, to see the vibrancy of the country first hand and to consider investing there for the mutual benefit, obviously, of the economies in Israel and Canada. We made the introduction, but it was one business leader speaking to another."

When Divon arrived in Ottawa at the end of the summer of 2000, the Middle East was a calmer place. Although U.S.-brokered peace talks at Camp David and Taba had been unsuccessful, there was still a sense a deal could be reached between Israel and the Palestinians with the appropriate goodwill on both sides.

Less than a month later, the situation changed radically with the start of a renewed, and ongoing, round of Palestinian terrorism.

"It was Rosh Hashanah," Divon recalled. "Some of us were on holidays. We received a message from Jerusalem that all personal holidays were cancelled."

Holidays have been a rare indulgence for the ambassador ever since.

The Jerusalem-born Divon learned about public service and devotion to ideals from his parents, who had emigrated to Mandatory Palestine from England. His mother was a third-generation British Jew. His father, a doctor born in Lithuania, eventually became director of the Hadassah Medical Centre in Jerusalem. Indeed, it was only by chance that he was not among the 77 nurses and doctors in a medical convoy to Hadassah on Mount Scopus who were slaughtered by Arab gunmen on April 13, 1948.

Divon's interview with The CJN took place the day before Canada's abstention in the UN General Assembly vote on the International Court of Justice ruling concerning Israel's security barrier.

Divon was asked about Israel's relations with Ottawa, in light of Canada's voting record on the Mideast at the UN.

"When there are disputes between us, as there will always will be between friends, it is imperative to overcome them in friendly and amicable ways," he said.

"It is very important to be able to have a frank dialogue with members of the cabinet of Canada, explaining, for example, the context for the building of the security fence.

"Our efforts must be effective, rather than emotional. To be sure, there is a place for emotions, but they must bring us to the point where our strategy becomes effective.

"We must carry on the type of dialogue with the government of Canada so that when the president of the State of Israel comes here on a visit, he is deeply moved by the reception extended to him. That dialogue solidifies the base from which we can move ever forward. It enables us to expand joint collaboration in other important fields as well. For example, did you know that Israel is possibly teaming up with Canada to provide specialized agricultural aid to Ethiopia?"

Divon is unambiguous in describing Canada's relations with Israel.

"Despite our disagreements, such as Canada's voting record at the UN, I would characterize Canada as one of our best friends," he said.

"When I send reports back to the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem, I am not gloomy in my outlook. We do have the support of friends here."

On the subject of the conflict with the Palestinians, Divon was equally emphatic.

"Eventually, we have to put an end to the conflict. We seek peace not as a favour to anyone else, but out of deep loyalty to our own needs, interests and values. Peace is in the prime interest of the State of Israel," he said.

"The political map is changing in Israel. The majority of Israelis support the disengagement initiative of the government. Prime Minster [Ariel] Sharon himself has undergone dramatic, historical change. He typifies the changes that have taken place in Israeli society."

Speaking of the disengagement plan, Divon said,"My heart is with [the Jews of Gaza]. They were the modern day chalutzim [pioneers], sent there by their governments. But if we want a democratic, Jewish state, there is no other way."

Citing Psalms, Divon noted that "we are commanded not just to seek peace but to actively pursue it."

When asked to recall personal highlights of the past four years, Divon mentioned the state visit by Israeli President Moshe Katsav and the exhibit in Montreal and Ottawa of the Dead Sea Scrolls, "where people were actually able to see a history of the Jews in Israel that spanned some 3,000 years." He also spoke about promoting joint scientific and trade programs between Israelis and Canadians, and the many visits of Canadian dignitaries – parliamentarians, professors and artists – to Israel, even during the height of the intifadah.

But he especially emphasized his relationship with Canada's Jewish community.

"The Jews of Canada have played an important role in helping boost Israeli morale and confidence these past four years. Canadian Jews are among the finest, most-organized, motivated and supportive communities in the galut [Diaspora]. I have even reported this to the prime minister and his officials in Israel.

"We were always made to feel like part of the family. It is as if we are bidding farewell to family. To say goodbye is difficult, because it is always hard to say goodbye to family.

"I would like to thank the community for enabling us to have had such a unique experience over the past four years."

Divon extended his good wishes to his announced successor, Alan Baker, whom he described as a highly qualified, superb professional.

"Israel will be well served, and the Jewish community will be delighted with him."

Divon made sure to place special emphasis on his parting remarks.

"The most difficult battle has yet to be won – that is, the battle for peace. But battling for peace makes us stronger, just as the love and support of Canadian Jewry also makes us stronger."

An ending and a new beginning

Guest Voice

I'm sitting in my 10th floor office in New York, with client files cluttering my desk and a look of disbelief on my face.

Has one year elapsed already? Do I really need to close all my old cases and transfer any active clients to my fellow legal advocates who remain at the Urban Justice Center? Are there really only seven more work days left and will I really be at the AVODAH: Jewish Service Corps's final retreat next weekend?

By ELISHEVA GOULD

My mind is reeling and my heart is confused as I try to fathom how such an intense year of front-line anti-poverty work, Jewish communal living with nine other unique people, learning about and pursuing tikkun olam, and living and working in Brooklyn and New York City, could be drawing to a close.

My 17 fellow AVODAH members and I have lived or worked together in New York for more than 11 months. We have had heated, late-night discussions about kashrut, communal food shopping and cooking, Shabbat observance and what it means to be invested in an "intentional community."

I have experienced some of what I imagine the tensions and joys of founding and living on a kibbutz must be! I have also faced the challenges of juggling an emotionally difficult job advocating for the needs of homeless and indigent clients with my own needs, as well as those of my housemates, my friends and my family at home.

As a young community living in the United States, we have explored crucial issues such as homelessness and urban poverty, globalization and gentrification, racism and education, and leadership and social responsibility, and often filtered them meaningfully through a lens of tzedakah and Jewish ethics.

We have planned and attended our own twice-weekly programming, monthly Sunday workshops and several weekend retreats. We've attended rallies and protests, supported one another's efforts and values, and visited each other's workplaces to better understand the diverse social justice work we've been doing. We have come back to our house late after work, a program, a trip home or a date, to find at least a handful of housemates waiting to hear how our day went, share stories, continue debates, comfort us or just be there to laugh and unwind together.

And now we will soon part ways. I think the hardest part will be the loneliness of not having nine housemates – as frustrated as we may have been with each other at times – simply "there" for me. Of course, some of us were closer friends than others, as is only natural, but we've shared so many trying and hilarious experiences that I think it's safe to say we all feel close to each another in many ways.

When we returned home after our winter retreat, for instance, our boiler had shut off and stayed off for three days, and the entire house was an enormous icicle. We could see our breath, had to bundle up in long underwear, ski jackets, hats and gloves, and turned on our two gas stoves for heat. When we walked up to the third floor, we discovered that the cold had made one of our walls crack and crumble and huge chunks of paint and plaster covered the stairs. We became well acquainted with our landlords after this incident!

Last weekend, we threw an end-of-the-year party and invited our friends and colleagues to see us off in style. It's easy to forget community politics and individual preferences when you band together to clean, decorate, shop and cook for a party, and then dance and joke around with your housemates and friends. Our party was a great success and it marked a milestone for us in our AVODAH bayit.

> And now we will soon part ways. I think the hardest part will be the loneliness of not having nine housemates – as frustrated as we may have been with each other at times – simply 'there' for me.

As we prepare to leave our home, some of us are gearing up for graduate school, others for international travel – to Israel, India, France and England. Some are going to their family homes, others to different jobs and apartments in New York City.

I am excited to be starting a new job as a Jewish studies teacher for grades 3 and 7 at a progressive day school on the Upper West Side.

In less than two weeks, my colleague, friend and fellow AVODAH member, Jenny, and I will be moving into our apartment near Columbia University and starting a new part of our lives.

KIDDISH

Jewish Kids' Fun Page

Shabbat Shalom

This story is based on a true event. It is set in Amsterdam, Holland, in the 1700s.

"Papa's home! Papa's home!" The excited children ran to greet their father. "Shabbat shalom, Ezra, Shabbat shalom, Miriam," laughed Jakob de Vries, bending down to kiss his children.

The table, swathed in a white-on-white tablecloth, was set with exquisite china. The candles from the previous night had already burned out, but the polished brass candlesticks still stood there, gleaming. Jakob's silver Kiddush cup was waiting for him at the head of the table, and next to it were two loaves of challah, draped in a lacy cover. Sarah, Jakob's wife, emerged from the kitchen. "Shabbat shalom," she smiled.

"Could I pour Papa's cup?" asked Ezra.

"Yes," said Sara, "but be careful." Holding his hands steady, Ezra filled the shining silver cup with bubbly red wine. Jakob picked it up, and recited the Kiddush.

"And the children of Israel shall keep the Shabbat... between Me and the children of Israel, it is an eternal sign that in six days God created the heavens and the earth and on the seventh day He rested...."

After Kiddush they washed their hands, said the blessing, and returned to their seats. Jakob picked up the two loaves, still covered in lace, and made the blessing over bread. Then he sliced the top challah and gave pieces to his wife and children.

A peaceful silence descended on the room as they ate their challah. Jakob smiled. He was glad it was Shabbat. Any other day of the week he would be busy with his gem business, examining precious stones, buying and selling. But today was reserved for himself, his family — and God.

"Papa," said Miriam, "You know what I learned from my tutor this week? When Moses was a baby his mother had to hide him, so..."

She was interrupted by a loud pounding on the door.

"Jakob de Vries?" demanded a commanding voice.

Jakob stood up and opened the door. Two well-dressed men were standing there.

"We are here on behalf of our master, the duke. He needs a quality diamond immediately. Please come at once with your finest selection. You will be rewarded greatly."

Jakob paled. The duke was his biggest customer. "Today is my Sabbath. The duke knows I do not do business on the Sabbath. I am terribly sorry, but I cannot come until tonight, when the Sabbath is over."

The messengers mounted their horses and rode off.

Jakob returned to his seat. "Papa, are you in trouble?" asked Ezra.

"Not at all," said Jakob. "Miriam, what were you saying about Moses?"

Half an hour later, the knocking came again. The messengers were back, accompanied by officers.

"Our master the Duke cannot wait until tonight. He needs a diamond now. If you refuse to come, he will never do business with you again. Do you understand?"

"I understand," replied Jakob, "but I cannot obey."

Another half hour passed, and the messengers returned, with more officers than before. They spoke harshly and tersely, with daggers in their eyes. "The duke is not interested in playing games with you. If you flont him like this he will take away your licence to sell gems."

Jakob swallowed. He spoke slowly, but with steel in his voice. "Your master knows that I would do anything for him. But I also answer to another master. My God forbids me to do business on His Sabbath, and I will obey His command."

Jakob returned to the table. "Yes, Ezra, I think I am in trouble." He turned to his wife. "But this shall not disturb our Shabbat." He raised his voice in song, and the entire family joined him.

"Between Me and the children of Israel, it is an eternal sign that in six days God created the heavens and the earth, and on the seventh day He rested."

Jakob held his cup high and recited the Havdalah in the flickering light of a colourful braided candle.

"Blessed are you, God, who separates between the holy and that which is not." He drank most of the wine. His daughter Miriam tilted the candle over a plate, and her father poured the remaining wine over it, putting it out.

"Shavuah Tovah," he said, "a good week."

Then he hastened to the basement, retrieved his valise of diamonds, mounted his horse, and galloped off to the duke's palace, formulating apologies in his head.

"You did the right thing," he told himself. "You did the right thing, come what may."

The Duke was waiting for him, smiling... smiling?

"Jakob! Thank you so much! You just made me 20,000 guilders richer! The governor of Flanders was visiting me the other day, and when I told him how religious you are, he bet me 20,000 guilders that if I offered you enough money and threatened you enough, you would be willing to violate your Sabbath. Thank you, Jakob. I knew you'd come through!"

Food, Scrumptious Food

Fast, fresh food – year round

By NORENE GILLETZ

Cookbooks are piled up in my office, my kitchen, my bedroom – wherever there is a spare corner. When I have a few moments, I sift through the tottering piles, looking for inspiration for my food column. I'm extremely busy, but I like preparing quick, healthy meals that celebrate summer's bounty.

When I opened award-winning author Peter Berley's book Fresh Food Fast (Regan Books, $49.95 Cdn), I was hooked. Here was an incredibly busy chef, teacher and family man who spoke my language. Berley understands how little free time most people have these days to cook healthy, hearty dinners made from fresh, flavour-packed ingredients.

Berley, together with Melissa Clark, offers recipes for 48 delicious, seasonal vegetarian meals that can be prepared with ease in under an hour. There are 12 mouth-watering menus for each season, including recipes, a shopping list organized by grocery aisles and an equipment list. There are delectable dessert recipes for each season. The recipes will bring pleasure to vegetarians and omnivores alike.

Berley offers speed tips that reveal the tricks of the restaurant trade. He believes that knowing the right tools and techniques to use is essential for getting dinner on the table amid the high-speed life most of us lead. He suggests using a food processor to help cut and shred vegetables if you are not skilled with a knife. Use a single pot of boiling water to blanch vegetables before cooking pasta. If you need to cut onions for two different dishes in the same menu, cut them at the same time. He suggests trying to cook seasonally, buying produce at its peak – when it will definitely taste best.

Unlike like most other cookbooks, which give only recipes, Berley's book of menus gives the reader a peek into the kitchen of a committed and professional fast, fresh cook. Each menu has a step-by-step game plan that shows you how to orchestrate the whole meal, including tips on how to combine the prepping steps so the recipes are quicker and easier to put together than they would be if made separately.

Berley offers the following game plan for this scrumptious summertime menu: Preheat the oven to 450 degrees. Meanwhile, prepare the squash salad, then prepare the vegetables and vinaigrette for the chopped salad. Make the pizzas, then finish the salad. Shave some parmesan cheese over the pizzas and serve immediately, accompanied by the squash. Enjoy!

PAN-SEARED SUMMER SQUASH

Pan-searing the squash caramelizes it and produces a nice crust. The sugars become concentrated and the juices are locked in. You can use the same technique with eggplant slices and onion rings.

2 pounds summer squash, sliced ½-inch thick
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 tbsp. fresh mint, torn into pieces
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
1 tsp. coarse sea salt or kosher salt, plus additional salt to taste
½ tsp. crushed red pepper flakes
3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
freshly milled black pepper

Warm a large heavy skillet, griddle or grill pan over medium heat. Arrange the squash in a single layer and sear until speckled with brown and beginning to blacken, about 5 minutes. Flip the squash and cook for 4 to 5 minutes more. Repeat with remaining squash.

In a serving bowl, combine the lemon juice, mint, garlic, salt and red pepper flakes and let marinate for 5 minutes. Whisk in the oil.

Transfer the seared squash to the bowl, toss to coat with the dressing, and let rest for about 5 minutes. Season with additional salt and pepper and serve. Yields 4 servings.

PITA PIZZA WITH GREEN OLIVES, MONTEREY JACK AND CHOPPED SALAD

Pocketless pita bread makes a convenient pizza base. You could also use any other tender, chewy flatbread, such as lavash.

For the chopped salad:

1 garlic clove, peeled and halved
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 small red onion, halved and very thinly sliced
¼ cup extra-virgin olive oil coarse sea salt or kosher salt and freshly milled black pepper
3 hearts of romaine, coarsely chopped (about 8 cups)
4 medium Kirby (pickling) cucumbers, quartered lengthwise and cut into bite-sized pieces
2 medium tomatoes, cored, seeds and diced (about 1 cup)
1 ripe avocado, diced
5 fresh basil leaves, torn into pieces
8 to 10 fresh mint leaves, torn into pieces

For the pizzas:

4 (7-inch) rounds of pocketless pita bread
8 ounces Monterey Jack cheese, coarsely grated
½ cup pitted and roughly chopped green olives
2 jalapeno peppers, minced, or 1 tsp. crushed red pepper flakes
freshly milled black pepper
shaved parmesan cheese for garnish

Place a pizza stone or an inverted rimmed baking sheet in the upper third of the oven and preheat the oven to 450.

To prepare the salad, vigorously rub the inside of a large bowl with the garlic. Add the vinegar and red onion and set aside for 5 minutes. Whisk in the oil and season with salt and pepper. Add the lettuce, cucumber, tomato, avocado, basil, and mint and toss well.

Bake the pitas, in batches if necessary, on the heated pizza stone or pan for 3 minutes.

In a small bowl, combine the cheese, olives, jalapenos and black pepper. Divide this mixture among the 4 pitas.

Return the pitas to the oven, 2 at a time, and bake until the cheese is bubbling and lightly browned, about 5 minutes.

Mound the salad on top of the pizzas, sprinkle with parmesan cheese and serve. Yields 4 servings.

Would Kerry's policies help Israel?

By RON KAMPEAS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BOSTON — It has become the buzz phrase of the U.S. Democratic convention: "Strength and wisdom are not opposing values."

Former U.S. president Bill Clinton earned an extended ovation in Boston last week when he packed John Kerry's message on security and international relations into those seven words. Kerry would not hesitate to act, the message suggests, but he also would show greater openness to the concerns of those outside his administration, and abroad.

"Democrats favour shared responsibility, shared opportunity and more global cooperation," Clinton said. "We live in an interdependent world in which we can't kill, jail or occupy all our potential adversaries, so we have to both fight terror and build a world with more partners and fewer terrorists."

The anxious question Jewish Democrats have been posing to those running the Massachusetts senator's campaign has been: What does the message – and its implied criticism of President George W. Bush's foreign policy – mean for Israel?

No one would speak on the record at what is necessarily a love-fest for the party's candidate. But in numerous behind-the-scenes meetings with senior Kerry officials, Jewish Democrats have posed hard questions: Would Kerry's overall plan to consult more with other nations, raise the profile of international bodies and restore Clinton-era co-operation with Europe pull the United States away from the extraordinary closeness Bush has forged with Israel?

The anxieties have hardly been quieted by speeches at the convention, where speaker after speaker has emphasized the kind of global co-operation that Israel's current Likud-led government reviles because of the perceived pro-Arab tilt of the European Union and other international bodies.

It didn't help that figures who have been on the wrong end of Jewish community anger eagerly reinforced that message in forums large and small.

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, who many Jews feel has taken a consistently pro-Palestinian line since being voted out of office in 1980, riled some when he drew a link between the Bush administration's Israel policy and anti-American animus.

"Violence has gripped the Holy Land, with the region increasingly swept by anti-American passions," Carter told the convention in a prime-time speech that many Democrats said marked his revival as a central figure in the party.

Robert Borosage, an adviser to Jesse Jackson's presidential campaign in 1988, reinforced the point in an Arab American Institute panel.

"America today is more isolated and less admired and less secure than ever," he said, citing U.S. policy toward Israel as one reason.

Senior Democrats say Kerry's message has more to do with alleviating pressure on America in Iraq, and not specifically with Israel. But that didn't stop the questions in closed-door forums.

Specifically, would Kerry defer to European demands that the United States end its isolation of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat?

As well, would Kerry be as proactive as Bush in pressing the Europeans to contain the surge in anti-Semitism? And would Kerry be as aggressive as Bush in isolating Iran and pressing it to dismantle its nuclear capability?

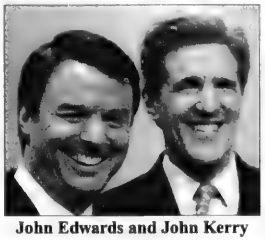
For answers, Democrats point to the party platform and Kerry's record:

He is unequivocal in supporting the isolation of Arafat and a nuclear shutdown in Iran. As far as anti-Semitism goes, Kerry campaigners suggest he may be even more adamant than Bush.

The president only has alluded to virulent strains of anti-Semitism in the Egyptian and Saudi mainstreams, they say, while Kerry has been more direct, even using an expletive in a meeting three years ago with Hosni Mubarak when the Egyptian president insisted he couldn't control the phenomenon.

On Iran, James Rubin, a Clinton-era State Department spokesperson who is touted as a possible national security adviser in a Kerry administration, said Kerry's policy of working more closely with European powers that are trying to persuade Iran to end its nuclear capabilities would be more effective than the Bush administration approach.

Should the Iranians fail to respond to European demands, Rubin said, the United States would then be in a position to use its allies to more effectively sanction Iran.



John Edwards and John Kerry

"That's called smart and tough diplomacy," he said.

Jewish leaders take comfort in such reassurances, but Democrats have been put on the defensive by a relentless Republican opposition research team: Even a tiny donation that trickled down from Teresa Heinz Kerry's charitable foundation to the virulently anti-Israel Council on American Islamic Relations has become an issue. Top Kerry officials say Heinz Kerry was at least three times removed from the donation, and was unaware of it.

It also doesn't help that Kerry often appears to follow Bush's lead in his pro-Israel policy, approving Israel's West Bank security barrier only after Bush did, and recognizing some Israeli West Bank claims and rejecting a Palestinian refugee "right of return" after Bush had already made those historic gestures.

The question of Kerry's approach to peacemaking was central in a packed National Jewish Democratic Council forum last week on whether Jews are turning Republican.

Several noted many in Israel are apprehensive at the prospect of increased U.S. pressure on Israel to make peace when it feels it doesn't have a trustworthy partner on the other side. Others at the forum said there was no reason to fear U.S. activism.

"Being pro-Israel means making sure Israel is at peace," said Geoffrey Lewis, a Boston lawyer who is active with the Israel Policy Forum. "An active U.S. engagement is critical to that goal."

Lewis said he believes most U.S. Jews would support greater engagement in the Middle East peace process.

Until now, one problem for the campaign had been the lack of a central pro-Israel figure in its top tier. Kerry filled that hole last week when he named Mel Levine, a former California congressman, to head the campaign's Middle East policy formulation.

The Kerry team is already using Levine, who until recently was a member of the board of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, to reach out to U.S. Jews, and he spoke at several Jewish events during the convention.

Kerry also has consulted with top Clinton-era Middle East officials Martin Indyk and Dennis Ross, both Jews, with a possible eye to appointments.

Levine, Ross and Indyk all have superb relations with the Jewish community, but they still pose a problem of timing: The current Israeli government, led by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, rejects the approach to peace that their biographies suggest, such as initiating and promoting final-status solutions that Likud leaders feel should be left only to Israel.

The Jewish Democrats attending the convention sympathize to a degree with the outlooks of Levine, Ross and Indyk.

Still, they dread confrontations between Sharon's government and a Kerry administration that could arise over disagreements about whether one side or the other is fulfilling its commitments.

More Gaza violence

Israel Defence Forces troops killed four armed Palestinians who were planting an explosive device near the al-Bureij refugee camp in Gaza last Friday, Army Radio reported. Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz was set to convene a meeting of security officials to discuss continued Qassam-rocket attacks on Israel, after Palestinians fired five rockets at Sderot in the Negev earlier in the day. Six people were treated for shock, and some municipal infrastructure sustained damage. Two rockets fell on the same area the day before. Earlier in the week, the IDF killed three terrorists in Gaza and the West Bank.

Straight as an Arrow

Israel and the United States conducted a successful test of the Arrow anti-ballistic missile system off the coast of California. The Defence Ministry said the Arrow intercepted an incoming Scud missile over the Pacific Ocean, while it was still in flight. This realistic test of the Arrow system was the first of its kind, and had been planned for two years. Israel developed the $2.2-billion (US) Arrow with U.S. assistance in response to the failure of American Patriot missiles to down the 39 Iraqi Scuds fired at Israel during the 1991 Gulf War.

Paris pleased with Sharon

France welcomed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's praise of its efforts to quell anti-Semitism. "We have seen the statements by the Israeli prime minister saluting France for its determined action in fighting anti-Semitism, action which he said was of exemplary value," a French Foreign Ministry spokesperson said last Thursday, referring to remarks by Sharon the night before. Addressing a group of 200 new French immigrants in Tel Aviv, Sharon thanked France for its "determined action" to stop anti-Jewish violence. The remarks were seen as a bid to repair ties with Paris after he recently called for French Jews to immigrate and avoid "the wildest anti-Semitism" in France. There has been a jump in aliyah from France recently – it was up by 26 per cent in the first half of 2004, Jewish Agency officials said.

Arafat, Qureia make up

The Palestinian Authority prime minister withdrew his resignation last week. "The president has rejected my resignation and I will comply," Ahmed Qureia told reporters after emergency talks with PA President Yasser Arafat in which Arafat allegedly promised Qureia more responsibility in security matters.

Jordanian minister: Israel's fence 'national security threat'

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN and YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

AMMAN — The current route of Israel's separation fence constitutes a "grave national security threat" to Jordan, Jordanian Foreign Minister Marwan Muashar warned last week.

In a wide-ranging interview in his Amman office, Muashar said the fence's current route, which cuts into the West Bank in several places, will prevent the establishment of an independent Palestinian state. Such a state is crucial for Jordan, he said, because without it, many West Bank residents would emigrate, and their only option is Jordan.

"Israel must understand that we are not against a fence per se. Israel's need to defend itself is clear and understandable, but it can put the fence on the 1967 border. A fence inside Palestinian territories, as currently planned, will divide the West Bank into three parts, and every Palestinian will need an Israeli permit to go from one part to another.

"In the long run, they'll have the following options: to seek Israeli citizenship, which won't happen; to continue living under occupation forever; or to emigrate to Jordan. It's clear which option they'll choose," Muashar said.

"This affects our national security. Jordan does have a large proportion of Palestinians, but it is not an alternative homeland for the Palestinians in the territories. I think they also understand this in [Israel's ruling] Likud [party]. They tell us in Israel that we are exaggerating, that nothing will happen and the scenario is extreme. We say that if we look 10 years ahead, the situation could change and the scenario won't be so extreme, so a Palestinian state must be established. The fence eliminates that option, and the option of peace with other states."

Muashar said Israel never made any proper response to the Arab peace initiative, which began as a Saudi Arabian initiative and was adopted by the Arab League summit in March 2002 with the support of all Arab states. The plan included full recognition of Israel and normalized relations with all Arab countries in exchange for a full withdrawal from territories captured in 1967. It also said the refugee issue would be resolved on the basis of UN General Assembly resolution 194, but in a manner agreeable to both sides, meaning Israel would be able to veto anything it did not accept.

"Two years have passed since then. There have been two Arab League summits and dozens of conferences and changes in the Arab world – but no Arab country has reneged on the peace initiative or retreated from the agreement to recognize Israel and forge fully normalized ties with it. The initiative includes… security guarantees for all countries in the region.

"Nobody will throw you into the sea, and the Arabs will give up on going back to Jaffa or Haifa," Muashar said, adding, "I think the Arabs made a mistake when they did not make an effort to appeal to Israeli public opinion."

Istanbul synagogue reopens eight months after bombing

By YIGAL SCHLEIFER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ISTANBUL — The shattered front of Istanbul's Neve Shalom synagogue, some eight months after powerful suicide truck bombs struck it and another local synagogue, is still covered in a tall white tarp that flaps in the wind.

Beside the synagogue is a deep pit, all that's left of an adjacent building that had to be torn down because of the damage it sustained. Across the street from Neve Shalom, scattered among the small neighbourhood shops that have reopened, are still-vacant buildings with windows shattered from the Nov. 15, 2003 blast.

Behind the tarp covering the synagogue's front, though, workers are busy pouring concrete and putting metal reinforcing rods in place for a new entrance. Inside Neve Shalom's main sanctuary, which suffered less damage from the bomb, workers on scaffolding are painting the synagogue's stately dome and installing new electric wiring.

It's a scene that, in many ways, symbolizes the current situation of Istanbul's Jewish community. While the damage and the scars of the November bombings are still easy to see, the community is busily working to move on. At the same time, community leaders say, the bombings have led to new security realizations and requirements, which may make it difficult – if not impossible – to return to life as it was before.

"We are in an ongoing trauma situation," says Lina Filiba, the Turkish Jewish community's executive vice-president. "The whole community right now is a construction pit – it's a continuation of the crisis that started Nov. 15."

"The change of lifestyle, the security consciousness, the restriction on the use of facilities is something that people are still getting used to."

The closing of Neve Shalom, the city's central synagogue and the spiritual heart of the community, has meant Istanbul's Jews have been without a place large enough to hold weddings, bar mitzvahs and other events. Community leaders say its reopening will be an important symbol of the community's rebuilding effort.

The synagogue was temporarily reopened this week, but the building's formal reopening is not slated until October.

But for Istanbul's Jews there is much else to get used to. Most of the city's 15 synagogues still remain closed, while the community re-evaluates the security situation at each building to determine what kind of changes are needed. Among the changes on the agenda are reinforcing walls to withstand bomb blasts and changing traffic patterns near Jewish institutions.

The city's largest Jewish social club, where classes were held and youth groups and a theatre club met, has been permanently shut down while a new club is being built in a more secure location. The entrance to the old club was on a busy thoroughfare; the new one is in a quiet neighbourhood behind a high cement wall.

"What's changed in our daily life is that in every Jewish institution there are now real security precautions. This is a transition period, until we take a look at the precautions and figure out if everyone is in a safe place," says Tilda Levi, editor of Shalom, Turkey's weekly Jewish newspaper.

Although there have not been any further attacks against Jewish targets since the November bombings – which also included strikes against the British Consulate and a British-owned bank several days later – there have been several events that have engendered deep unease in the Jewish community. In March, two suicide bombers from a militant Turkish Islamist group attacked a masonic lodge on Istanbul's Asian side, killing two and injuring six.

Masons are frequently accused by Islamists and nationalists in Turkey of being a front for Jewish and Israeli interests, and, according to Turkish press reports, one of the bombers shouted "death to the Israeli lodge" as he was being taken injured to the hospital.

In the subsequent investigation, it turned out that a gun the bombers had been carrying had been the one used in the unsolved murder of Yasef Yahya, a Jewish dentist who was found killed execution style in his office the previous August. In a police re-creation of the murder, the suspects who had been arrested told investigators that they decided to kill Yahya after seeing his Jewish name on the sign outside his office.

In early May, meanwhile, Turkish police arrested a group of 16 men in connection with an alleged plot to bomb the NATO summit that recently took place in Istanbul. Although the plan was vague, the group – which police said had links to Al Qaida – apparently had a more developed plan to bomb one of the synagogues in Bursa, a city near Istanbul that has a small Jewish community of 70 people.

For many members of the Turkish Jewish community, the combination of events and the emergence of home-grown Turkish militant Islamist groups that see Jews as legitimate targets has had a chilling effect.

"People don't want to go to synagogue. They are scared," says Bensi Elmas, a dentist whose office is down the street from that of the murdered Yahya. "People think that an attack could happen again. But the community leaders say we should go, otherwise the terrorists will win."

Community members and leaders say their sense of discomfort has also been heightened by what they see as the increasingly vocal criticism of Israel in the country, criticism that they say is often turned toward them.

"When Israel does something against Muslims, you have protests here and then people here look at us and say, 'Look what you did,'" says Sabbatai Iyigor, a cantor at one of Istanbul's synagogues.

For example, a recent article in The New Yorker magazine that claimed that Israeli agents are training Iraqi Kurd commandos in the event that Iraq falls into chaos and the Kurdish north declares its autonomy, led to a flurry of criticism of Israel in the Turkish media.

Israel has denied the claims, but Turkey views any moves the Kurds make in Iraq with great suspicion and the possibility that Israel, an ally, was working with them was not well received. Some of what was written, though, was pointedly directed at Turkey's Jewish community.

Jewish life reborn in Muslim Russian republic

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

KAZAN, RUSSIA — Although Kazan is a major industrial town with a reputation for fine universities and technical schools – Lenin studied here as a youth – the capital of the Tatar republic is barely known outside of Russia.

Located 800 kilometres east of Moscow on the Volga River, Kazan is home to 10,000 Jews. Jews have lived in this mostly Muslim city of 1.3 million for upward of 150 years, but the city's Jewish population increased substantially during World War II as refugees fled ahead of Nazi forces.

Kazan was also the site of important wartime factories – some already in place, others that were disassembled in western Russia and transported east by rail to take them outside the range of German guns.

Although the residents of Kazan avoided the kind of destruction seen in Moscow and Stalingrad, the Jews of this city know the horrors of the Holocaust, the trauma of communist repression and now, the joys resulting from the rebirth of Jewish life.

Elizabeth Brekeleva's life spans all three eras. At 82, she is a regular at Chesed Moshe, the community's seniors' club that meets in a large room above the city's lone synagogue. In the Soviet era, she could only dream that one day she would be free to gather with like-minded friends and celebrate their Jewish heritage.

A graduate of a pedagogic institute and for many years an English teacher, Brekeleva was evacuated from Moscow to Kazan during World War II.

After the war, she taught English, retiring in 1987. With the renaissance in Jewish life in Russia following the collapse of communism, Brekeleva sought out Chesed Moshe, where she has volunteered for six years as an English teacher.

Brekeleva's Russian husband died a few years ago, and she finds the camaraderie and companionship of fellow Jews heartening. Today, she has more than a few regrets about her life choices, many prompted by the unforgiving cruelty of living under a communist regime after the Nazis had murdered most of her family.

Her daughter, Zinaida Brekeleva, a surgeon visiting Kazan from the Arkhangelsk Region in Russia's far north, shares some of her mother's regrets as well as the comforts of an awakening Jewish consciousness.

"I was a Jew and sometimes I was ashamed of my nationality [during the Soviet period]," said Elizabeth. As a teacher in the city's Aviation Institute, she avoided using her Jewish-sounding patronymic, Zinovieva. Instead, she went by the name Petrovna, which is "more of a Russian name," she said. "After the war," she explained, "there were many people against Jews."

She also felt alone, unconnected to the Jewish world she had been forced to leave behind. Back in her native Byelorussia (Belarus today), the Nazis had killed her parents along with three brothers and a grandmother. With her immediate family destroyed and her link to her Jewish past gone, she married a Russian man.

Though he treated her well, Elizabeth nevertheless looks back on her life with sadness. "It's my great sorrow, you see. I lost my parents, three brothers, my grandmother, very young. I was 19 then. I saw them in 1940. It was my last meeting with my parents. All my life, I cry. It's very hard.

"I did want a man to understand me well. I always wished to marry a Jewish man, to have a soul connection," she said.

Although that element was missing in her life, the creation of Chesed Moshe a few years ago seems to have rekindled a connection to the Jewish people. "Chesed helped me remember my nationality and to feel happy here," Elizabeth said. "It's my second home here. I feel here very well."

Elizabeth Brekeleva and her daughter Zinaida

Beyond the friendships and social activities offered by Chesed Moshe, Elizabeth has begun celebrating Jewish traditions and holidays, as she did when she was a girl.

"It makes me feel very well. I am quite calm," she said.

Zinaida, who has four children ranging in age from 36 to 16, said she appreciates her mother's renewed interest in her Jewish heritage and she, too, has found that lost Jewish soul. All of their lives, she said, she felt her mother's sadness and her inability to find a Jewish way to express it.

"Here she feels herself Jewish, and I'm pleased to feel myself Jewish," she said. "I feel in my soul that I'm Jewish. Any Jewish melody will always bring me to tears. It's not a Russian tradition. The Russian tradition is more open, more festive, while the Jewish soul is always a memory, a connection to history, to the people."

Only a few years ago, there was no Chesed Moshe in Kazan, no organized religious life, no Jewish school, not much of anything to connect Jews to their collective soul.

With the liberalization of Russian society, religious life has blossomed and many faith communities have seized the opportunity to worship openly.

At great risk, Jews had maintained an underground religious life during the Soviet years. Shabbat was celebrated with prayer services in private apartments, but locations were frequently changed to avoid the notice of police. Matzah had been baked in Kazan for years and distributed through a clandestine network to those who wanted it. The community even supported a shochet until the 1980s, and anybody who wanted kosher meat knew how to find it.

With the end of the Soviet era, life began to ease for those wishing to live an openly Jewish life. Leonid Sonts, a musician and community leader, popularized Jewish culture through his renowned band, Simcha, reminding Jews of their rich heritage and proving Jewish culture could have a broad appeal.

In 1995, the old synagogue, which the communists had turned into a cultural centre, was returned to the community. In February 1997, the community's lone rabbi, Yitzchak Gorelik, moved to Kazan with his wife, Chanah, and their family. Gorelik, 30, was one of dozens of rabbis sent to Russia by the Chabad movement to do missionary work within the country's far-flung Jewish communities.

Russia's main cities, Moscow and St. Petersburg, had no problem attracting rabbis, but Jews in smaller centres in European Russia, as well as in Siberia and the newly independent former Soviet republics like Ukraine, Belarus, Moldova and Lithuania found it difficult.

Gorelick was willing to go wherever Chabad sent him. In Kazan, he found a community eager for him to establish the framework of Jewish religious life, help it reclaim its Jewish heritage, create community institutions, educate its children and help them celebrate Jewish holidays.

In the early days of religious freedom in Russia, young Chabad rabbis and students were sent as shiluchim (emissaries) to begin the long process of educating the communities in Jewish religious practice.

When he arrived in 1997, Rabbi Gorelick found the community had maintained a rudimentary religious life, albeit in the shadows.

With two vintage Torah scrolls that had been hidden from the authorities, Rabbi Gorelick set about developing the synagogue as the centre of community life. It was a task, he said, that was in keeping with long-standing Lubavitch practice. Lubavitch, he noted, had originated in Russia and the fifth Lubavitch rabbi's religious activities had landed him in a Soviet prison. One of his acolytes, Rabbi Alter Stolov, had served as Kazan's religious leader from 1945 to his death in 1968.

The local authorities knew about his activities, but because his work was not done in the open and most of his congregation were elderly, he was allowed to function.

However, teaching young people about Judaism was forbidden and one rabbi, Yitzhak Zilber, was harassed for doing so. Forced to flee to Tashkent, Rabbi Zilber eventually made aliyah and now lives in Israel, Rabbi Gorelick recounted.

Like Rabbi Zilber, Rabbi Gorelick also has a Tashkent connection. His father was born in the Uzbek city and his grandparents hailed from Rogachov in what is today Belarus. His grandfather, also a rabbi, was imprisoned for eight years for organizing Jewish activities and was only amnestied when Stalin died in 1953.

Rabbi Gorelick considers his move to Kazan a return to his Russian roots. "If you drop something, it falls in its place," he said.

When Chabad officials suggested he take the position in Kazan, he readily accepted. "I was brought up in a Chabad atmosphere and since early childhood, I was told [we should] be shiluchim. I knew after graduation, we would go somewhere where we would be helpful."

In the division of labour adopted by the Kazan Jewish community, Rabbi Gorelick is in charge of the religious life as well as Jewish education. In addition to operating the synagogue, he offers religious classes, organizes the chevrah kadishah, arranges for brit milahs, operates the mikvah, officiates at bar mitzvahs and weddings, places mezuzot on doorposts, offers books of Judaic content to the congregation and helps organize a kindergarten for 17 children.

He plans to open a religious school next year.

Rabbi Gorelick is also the most visible representative of the community. At state and municipal functions, it is Rabbi Gorelick who stands in for the Jewish community.

Alexander Velder, chair of the United Jewish Community of Kazan, explained that Rabbi Gorelick has the same representative status as the local mullahs who speak for the Muslim community. However, the secular community organization also has good relations with the regional government – a development he attributes in large part to signals emanating directly from Russian President Vladimir Putin.

In a highly publicized event, Putin attended the opening in Moscow of a community campus building, reconstructed by Chabad after it was firebombed by anti-Semitic vandals. "It's quite enough he makes positive statements about Jews and Jewish life," said Velder, speaking through his interpreter and son Ilya. "All the other governors are in line with that."

In another highly publicized event, Tatarstan president, Mintimer Shaimiev, invited Rabbi Gorelick to the local "kremlin" – the government offices – in 2002 to light a large chanukiyah and to send greetings to the Jewish community, said Ilya.

Ilya, who plans to study law in the United States, said, "Here, this place is really tolerant and the community has equally good relations with the presidential administration and the mayor."

While the community has good external relations, internally it is struggling to meet the social and cultural needs of a people who had long relied on government for all its needs.

So far, it has established the seniors' club, a Jewish high school, a student union and the kindergarten.

In the spring, the community purchased a building for three million rubles ($100,000 US) and is planning to create a seniors' hospice that will eventually house 50 elderly Jews. Velder said the Joint Distribution Committee has agreed to support it in part, as will the local government, but Kazan's Jews will have to come up with half a million dollars.

Velder acknowledges it is hard to convince Russian Jews to ante up the funds needed for such projects. "For about 80 years of Soviet power, the authorities demolished every sense of Jewish identity, and only for the last 10 years we have been trying to revive it."

Today, the community's budget relies on gifts from about 15 well-to-do businessmen, 10 of whom sit on the community council's board. "There are a lot of people who have the idea that the community is well funded by foreign organizations and this is a reason people don't need to support the community. Our task is to convince them it's not the case," Velder said.

Paul Lungen was recently a guest of Chabad Lubavitch in Russia.

"The demand for scotch has risen tremendously in the past few years. It has become the drink of choice for large numbers of North Americans, and also Japanese who are big consumers. Twelve years ago, no one would have predicted today's demand for scotch."

Especially in synagogues, he said, kiddush club members are enjoying it across North America.

Nathan says he had his first taste of whisky when he was seven years old and "my bubbie gave me a little bit with warm water. My parents are now [in their 80s] and they have a glass of scotch every day. It is in my blood; I grew up with it."

Although whisky is made in a number of countries, says Nathan, scotch whisky comes only from Scotland. Single malt indicates that the whisky, though possibly from different casks, was made in only one distillery and has not been blended with any other product.

Blended scotch, on the other hand, contains a variable proportion of blended malt and grain whiskies. A good quality blend may contain more than 40 per cent malt, an inferior one much less.

The maturation of scotch stops at bottling, so a 12-year-old whisky bottled four years ago is still a 12-year-old whisky. "One member of the kiddush club has bought a barrel of scotch and is waiting 10 years for it to mature," says Nathan.

It is a sipping drink, he says. "People drink it for the taste. I'm amazed when I pour someone a good single malt and they gulp it down. You cannot gulp and appreciate. Vodka is a fuel, it has no taste; scotch is to be appreciated."

Different scotches have different flavours, he says. "I can detect the smoothness, smokiness, colour, and bouquet or smell. When it is poured, I hold the glass in my hand to warm it up, and then swill it around to release the taste. Scotch glasses have a wide top so the drinker can sniff it while drinking."

It is usually accompanied by snacks. "At a simchah, we drink scotch at the cocktail hour, but not at the meal. The absolute best thing to eat with scotch is shmaltz herring. When I come home from work, I may have a glass of scotch and some herring before I decide what to have for dinner."

He brings a bottle of single malt scotch to the kiddush club when there is a special occasion such as a birthday, or the recent anniversary.

There has been some controversy about the kashruth of certain scotches, he says, because some rabbis have an issue about drinking scotch that has been aged in a wine or sherry-based cask. Wines, and other products made from grapes, are subject to rigorous halachic strictures.

Sherry casks are wooden barrels that were originally used for the storing or aging of sherry wine. Similarly, port casks used in some scotch selections were originally used to store or age port wines.

But the halachic issue surrounding the case of sherry or port casks has been answered, according to Nathan, by Rabbi Jeremy Rosen, an Orthodox rabbi from Glasgow who has a pulpit in a north London synagogue. He writes that the "sherry casks used to mature some malts are imported bone dry and the main value of the sherry lies simply in the seasoning of the wood and perhaps some discolouration.

As well, Rabbi Reuven Lauffer, of Ohr Somayach/Tannenbaum College in Jerusalem, says that "from a halachic standpoint, even if the scotch is aged in sherry casks, the scotch is more than six times the volume of the wood, and it is kosher."

The first time Weinberger was served scotch, he says, he was told it was an acquired taste. "I soon began drinking any type of scotch I was given.

"When I started drinking single malt scotch, however, I was converted completely. I hardly drink rye now at all.

"Scotch is a drink that needs to be sipped. Then the flavour can be appreciated."

After a Friday-evening meal, he says, he puts out four or five selections of scotch so his guests can have a choice. "I will put out rye, if that is what they want."

At the B'nai Torah Congregation's Haftorah kiddush club, they generally drink blended scotch unless there is a special occasion, says member Michael Stavsky.

"Some blends are good, but when I drink single malt, I can detect the smoothness. If I were blindfolded, I could tell the difference. Each single malt has its own subtle flavour."

Stavsky, 28, who began drinking scotch several years ago, has expanded his collection since he moved here from Denver, Colorado, he says.

"Scotch should not be drunk like wine. It is for a l'chaim or after dinner. It is very much a social drink. It's not something to drink for the alcohol effects. It should be sipped and enjoyed with friends."

About Nutrition

Q. Now that so many great fruits are in season, I am wondering which are the best ones to choose?

A. Eating a wide variety of fruit is in general a good rule of thumb, because you get a variety of nutrients. However, some are more nutritious than others. Choose blueberries – they're a real nutrition powerhouse, excellent for your heart and brain. Choose strawberries – they're high in vitamin C, fibre and low in calories. Choose cantaloupe, an excellent source of vitamin C. Choose peaches and nectarines, as well as plums, cherries, raspberries, blackberries and watermelon. Most importantly, eat the fruits you enjoy, and lots of them.

Q. I was recently told that my cholesterol is high. I don't really understand what this means or what I should do.

A. First, and very important, go back to your doctor and find out what part of your cholesterol is high. When cholesterol levels are gleaned from a blood test, many readings are usually taken, including your HDL cholesterol (good cholesterol), LDL cholesterol and triglycerides (both bad cholesterols, but requiring different dietary interventions). Many people do not know which is the problem and, therefore, can't make the appropriate dietary changes.

Once you gather that information, follow these recommendations.

If your HDL is high, you're OK. This is your protective cholesterol and sometimes makes your overall or total cholesterol number high, when in fact you're in good shape.

If your LDL is high, you should reduce your intake of foods containing saturated and trans fats, such as red meat, butter, cream, pastry, cheese, fried foods, crackers and cookies. At the same time, you should eat more foods with fibre and boost your activity levels.

If your triglycerides are elevated, reduce sugars and alcohols, in the form of such things as fruit, pastry, desserts, jams, juices, pop, beer and liquor.

Losing about 15 to 20 pounds also usually helps reduce bad cholesterol.

Jammers relive their high-school rock-band glory days

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

I slide my left hand down the top string of the electric bass, hitting the right note for the chorus of Van Morrison's Brown Eyed Girl.

I'm jamming, I say to myself, as if the activity is as novel as scuba-diving would be for me. It feels empowering.

Surrounding me are strangers who are sharing in my rock-star moment: Godwin is an emergency physician by day, guitar virtuoso by night; Melissa practises law but sings like The Mamas and The Papas' Cass Elliot; Brian is self-employed and a singer-cum-pianist, a smile always stretching across his face.

What invigorates these closet musicians are the jam sessions at Downtown Jam, on the fifth floor of a Toronto building at Richmond and Church streets.

Six nights a week, Downtown Jam members file into three studios equipped with drum sets, guitars, microphones, speakers and electric keyboards. Wires snake across the floor.

The jam's founder, Andrew Hall, says it's a playground for adults, where amateur musicians can play classic rock tunes in a carefree, audience-free space. The jam provides songbooks containing 500 songs, along with their guitar and bass tabs – written notes or chords – printed above the lyrics. Musicians simply call out a song and the others flip to the page to follow along.

Hall has run Downtown Jam for eight years, to give Torontonians a chance to relive their high-school rock-band glory days. "This isn't the karaoke experience," he says. "People forget about their day jobs and collaborate here. They actually create."

And is the jam as satisfying to organize as it is to participate in? "I'm making a living out of having fun," Hall says.

He spends 75 hours a week on Downtown Jam, and although others might consider him an entrepreneur, Hall says he's not the type to wear a business suit. "I never took a business course," he says.

In 1996, after an inspirational talk with his brother, Hall took his musical experience – as a drummer and self-taught pianist – into the business realm and opened Downtown Jam. At first, only a handful of people joined the jam, but today each night is packed with a half-dozen groups of four to nine jammers.

A first-year jam membership costs $289. For a 2½-hour jam session, there's a $23 charge for musicians and a $16 fee for singers. Non-member rates are $46 a session for musicians and $32 for singers.

When new members join the jam, Hall says he has to hold their hands until they get used to the format. Ideally, members learn to network and join jam sessions that are in progress, he adds. Several bands have formed out of Downtown Jam.

"Watching people connect really fires me up," Hall says. He has seen different cultures – Jewish and Asian musicians, for instance – collaborate to create "truly rockin' music," he says, adding that music has always broken barriers.

Hall has a message for prospective Downtown Jammers. "If you're here for fun, you're here for the right reason."

While I'm playing at Downtown Jam, I study the faces around me. The drummer's lips are pursed as he slams his stick on the cymbal. The guitarist grins as his fingers dance in a Jimi Hendrix-style solo. Here, I understand that dreams can be realized and the past can return like a beloved melody. Like hundreds of beloved melodies.

Downtown Jam is at 74 Richmond St. E., fifth floor. For more information, phone Hall at 416-585-9998.

Control Room takes close look at Al-Jazeera

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Until recently, Al-Jazeera – the Arab satellite television station with an estimated viewership of 40 million – had little or no regard for hallowed journalistic standards such as fairness and objectivity.

Intensely criticized by the United States and Israel for its one-sided coverage of the second Gulf war and the Arab-Israeli conflict, Al-Jazeera won the admiration of some Muslims by broadcasting exclusive images of Al Qaeda chieftain Osama bin Laden in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C.

And of late, Al-Jazeera, based in Doha, Qatar, has been a principal medium for anti-American Iraqi insurgents announcing the capture and killings of foreign hostages.

Taking Washington's criticism to heart, Al-Jazeera last month unveiled a new code of ethics to ensure balanced and sensitive reporting.

Several days later, the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), in a long-awaited decision, ruled that cable and satellite operators here may carry Al-Jazeera on digital channels.

The CRTC, however, stipulated that Canadian distributors of Al-Jazeera would have to monitor it for "abusive comment" and "alter or curtail" programming deemed offensive.

This caveat won the support of the Canadian Jewish Congress, which had been quite concerned about Al-Jazeera's propensity for airing material many Jews regarded not only as crudely anti-Israel but as implicitly anti-Semitic.

Judging by Jehane Noujaim's new and jaunty documentary about Al-Jazeera's treatment of last year's war in Iraq, Control Room, currently playing in Canadian theatres, western standards of objectivity appear alien to Al-Jazeera.

Deema Khatib, a young producer, puts it best when she observes that objectivity is "almost like a mirage," and that both the United States and Al-Jazeera have an agenda to pursue.

In keeping with its mandate to show the human cost of the war in Iraq, Al-Jazeera touched off a storm of protest in the Bush administration when it ran inflammatory footage of wounded Iraqis, captured and slain U.S. soldiers and shattered buildings bombed by American pilots.

Addressing this contentious issue head-on in the spirit of fair-mindedness, Control Room lets both sides vent steam.

Samir Khader, Al-Jazeera's senior producer, a reflective man raised in Iraq, makes it abundantly clear that, as Arabs and Muslims, he and his colleagues are "for the Iraqi people."

ASHKENAZ FESTIVAL 2004 LIVENS UP LABOUR DAY WEEKEND IN TORONTO

Focusing on the theme of migration, the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture 2004 brings a bustling weekend of music, film, theatre, literature, lectures and storytelling to Toronto's Harbourfront Centre over the Labour Day weekend.

The festival, which has put Toronto at the forefront of the international klezmer scene, runs from sundown Saturday, Sept. 4, through Monday, Sept. 6. The international roster includes artists from Ethiopia, France, South America, and Holland. Pre-festival activities begin Aug. 31 and many events are free. Highlights include:

• A free open-air concert by The Klezmatics. Harbourfront CIBC Stage, Sept. 4, 9:30 p.m.

• Pre-festival concert by Klezmer en Buenos Aires, with clarinetist Cesar Lerner and accordionist Marcelo Moguilevsky. Miles Nadal JCC, Thursday Sept. 2, 8 p.m. The group also performs in Harbourfront's Brigantine Room, Sept. 5, 7 p.m. $36 for each concert.

• Pianist Marilyn Lerner performs her original score to the silent Yiddish film East and West, which was Molly Picon's first film. Nadal JCC, Wednesday Sept. 1, 8 p.m. and Harbourfront's Studio Theatre, Sept. 5, 2 p.m. Klezmer en Buenos Aires presents its musical version of the comedy film classic, Sept. 6, 5 p.m. $18 for each performance.

• The Yiddish Radio Hour resurrects the classics of Yiddish radio in Canada from the 1930s to the '50s, celebrating many forgotten geniuses and important recordings. Harbourfront, Sept. 5, 4:30 p.m. and Sept. 6, 2:30 p.m. $15.

• Yossi Vassa, the "Eddie Murphy of Israel," presents It Sounds Better in Amharic, a moving and often hilarious personal account of his 700-km trek from Ethiopia to Israel. Harbourfront Studio Theatre, Sept. 4 and 5, 8 p.m. $15.

• From Holland, Ot Azoj presents an artful blend of klezmer and contemporary eastern European folk music. Harbourfront CIBC Stage, Sept. 4, 8 p.m.

• The Berlin duo Khupe offers improvisation and innovation that remain true to klezmer's roots. Harbourfront CIBC Stage, Sept. 5, 9:30 p.m. and Sept. 6, 2:15 p.m.

•The French-Canadian band Manouche delivers sexy, energetic renditions of old Yiddish standards. Harbourfront's Toronto Star stage, Sept 5, 5:30 p.m. (Other Quebec performers at the festival include Shtreimi and Jeszce Raz.)

• Film buffs will enjoy Yale Strom's Klezmer on Fish Street as well as the 1935 French-Czech cult film The Golem, the hilarious Catskill Honeymoon and the Edgar Ulmer and Moishe Oysher melodrama, The Singing Blacksmith (Yankel der Schmidt).

For tickets and information, please call 416-973-4000 or visit the websites, www.ashkenazfestival.com or www.harbourfrontcentre.com.

Names in the News: Toronto Rabbi Immanuel Schochet has drawn much ink in Britain recently for his outspoken criticism of the celebrity-backed Kabbalah Centre of London, which Madonna and others have catapulted into the gossip columns. It's "sheer nonsense" for the centre to encourage non-Hebrew readers to scan the text of the Zohar, he told a London gathering, according to the Jewish Chronicle. "Superstition is very powerful," he reportedly said. "Because a person is rational and well educated, it doesn't mean they're safe from it." A lawsuit that the centre filed in Canada against Schochet in 1993 is now "dormant," the Chronicle reported.

•Congrats and many happy returns to "Honest" Ed Mirvish, who celebrated his 90th birthday with 10,000 of his closest friends on Sunday, July 25, outside Honest Ed's in Toronto's Mirvish Village. Among many distinguished attendees was Mayor David Miller, who declared July 25 as Ed Mirvish Day.

Al-Jazeera knows where its bread is buttered

But as Noujaim – an Arab-American filmmaker – suggests, the editors and managers of Al-Jazeera allow their fixed views to colour their interpretation of events.

One Al-Jazeera reporter claims that Washington's motive for invading Iraq was to seize oil fields and gain hegemony over the Middle East. Still others express shock and embarrassment when Baghdad falls to the American army.

On a personal level, some Al-Jazeera employees display nothing but dripping contempt for U.S. military spokespersons.

It seems clear that Al-Jazeera's management has no real interest in the impartial presentation of the news. In brief but sharp news clips, Donald Rumsfeld, the American secretary of defence, voices outrage over Al-Jazeera's tendency to "play fast and loose" with the truth.

Yet Central Command, which planned and prosecuted the war against Saddam Hussein, also seems to be in the business of "managing" the news, CNN correspondent Tom Mintier claims.

In its defence, Central Command explains that its troops would be put at risk were too much information to be released at once.

Control Room reaches a peak of intensity when Al-Jazeera's helmeted correspondent in Baghdad is killed during a U.S. bombing raid. Al-Jazeera management believes he was deliberately targeted as punishment for its skewed coverage of the war.

An Al-Jazeera anchorperson in a scene from Control Room.

It will come as no surprise that Al-Jazeera reporters are antagonistic to Israel. One speaks about "massacres in Palestine," while another contends that Israel and the United States are trying to reshape the Middle East.

But in a refreshing comment, Hassan Ibrahim, a wizened and seasoned staffer, whose wife works in Jerusalem, takes Arabs to task for blaming Israel instead of Arab regimes for the state of their societies.

One of the most intriguing figures in Control Room is Abdallah Schliefer, an American Jewish convert to Islam and an Arab publicist. He complains that Israeli soldiers brutalize Palestinians, and says that Arabs conflate Israelis with Americans.

Khader explains that its mission is to encourage free debate and to "shake up" and "awaken" the Arab world.

In a sense, Al-Jazeera has achieved these objectives since its founding in 1996. But for self-serving reasons, Al-Jazeera has not had the spunk or the courage to broadcast unfavourable stories about Qatar, where it is headquartered.

Love it or hate it, Al-Jazeera knows where its bread is buttered.

First-time author copes with sudden literary fame

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For David Bezmozgis, an up-and-coming Canadian writer who has been compared to the American master Saul Bellow, fame sometimes seems like a tiresome distraction.

"All this attention is distracting for someone who's supposed to sit quietly in a room and write," said Bezmozgis, whose first published book, Natasha and Other Stories (Harper-Flamingo), has been universally acclaimed by reviewers in Canada and the United States.

"But it's a welcome distraction. I understand the significance of it," he allowed in a recent interview at the World Class Bakers café on St. Clair Ave. West, a five-minute walk from his mid-town Toronto home, located on a tree-lined street.

Bezmozgis, 31, was a struggling and virtually unknown writer until quite recently. But in 2003, while toiling as a producer for a Toronto-based digital documentary television channel, his prospects suddenly and spectacularly blossomed when his stylistically spare and somewhat autobiographical stories about a fictional Russian Jewish family in Toronto, the Bermans, successively appeared in The New Yorker and Harper's and in such literary magazines as Grain, Prairie Fire and Zoetrope.

Now they have been published in book form in Natasha, which has been translated into Hebrew, German, French, Dutch, Spanish, Italian, Japanese and Latvian.

Bezmozgis, who crafted the tales over an intense two-year period, is naturally pleased with the attention he has received of late.

But the demands of promoting Natasha have taken an inevitable toll.

"I've been travelling more and writing less," complained Bezmozgis, a tall, soft-spoken, reticent man whose extremely casual attire and black horn-rimmed glasses give him a decidely intellectual and detached air.

"I haven't been able to get into my new novel the way I would have liked," he said. "In the last few months, there has been an upheaval."

His complaints notwithstanding, Bezmozgis realizes he is on a roll and far luckier than most writers his age.

Natasha's success has finally given him the kind of financial independence he craves. "I can do what I want. I'm my own man."

And best of all, he knows editors are waiting for his first novel – which he is currently writing and declined to discuss – and his next batch of short stories.

Apart from all that, he no longer has to submit work on spec. When he began writing seriously as an undergraduate at McGill University, he never knew whether his submissions would even be acknowledged.

In some cases, his stories disappeared into black holes of indifference. In yet other instances, works such as An Animal to the Memory, Choynski and Roman Berman, Massage Therapist, all of which can be found in the pages of Natasha, were returned with encouraging words.

"I was dejected, but I realized there was someone out there who recognized me," he said of those years in the wilderness.

Bezmozgis achieved his first real breakthrough while studying English literature at McGill. His play, The Last Waltz: An Inheritance, was produced on campus and subsequently by the Playwrights' Workshop Montreal.

Under the partial influence of his parents, Mendel and Sarah, Soviet immigrants who arrived in Canada in 1980 from the former Soviet Union, and to whom Natasha is dedicated, Bezmozgis made an abrupt U-turn.

Concerned that the writer's life offered him less than a secure future, the principal reason his parents emigrated from Riga in the first place, he studied film at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles.

Bezmozgis finished a master of fine arts degree and churned out three documentaries, including L.A. Mohel, a film about ritual circumcisers, in Los Angeles. But his dream of selling a screenplay to an independent producer, or directing a feature, never panned out.

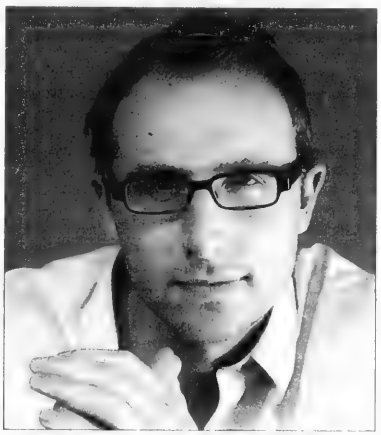
During his sojourn in California, Bezmozgis met two people who had an enormous impact on him – Leonard Michaels, an under-appreciated novelist (The Men's Club) who took him under his wing, and Wyatt Mason, a writer, critic and translator who detected promise in Bezmozgis' budding talents.

He learned a lot from Michaels, who died last year.

"He writes very succinctly and combines humour and emotion with great intelligence," said Bezmozgis, who has also been influenced by Philip Roth, Isaac Babel and Mordecai Richler.

In a further reference to Michaels, Bezmozgis added, "Also, he's a Jewish writer who writes about Jews in a secular mode, though his characters are undeniably Jewish."

Mason played an integral role by showing his stories to Lorin Stein, an editor at Farrar, Strauss and Giroux. Stein was impressed and asked for more.



David Bezmozgis

In retrospect, Bezmozgis is not sure whether his stories would have been acceptable to Farrar, Strauss and Giroux without Mason's intervention. However, he is quite confident they were worthy of publication and would have been picked up by a different publisher had Mason not come along.

Typically, Bezmozgis sticks to a rigorous regimen, writing every day and composing his work on a computer.

"It would be hard to write in long hand because I edit as I write. I don't leave anything on the screen I'm uncomfortable with. I essentially finish a story in the first draft."

Bezmozgis, who lives with his girlfriend Hannah Young, has few memories of his childhood in Latvia, where his family has deep roots. Last year, he and his parents visited Riga, the capital, and thought it looked exceedingly western, far more so than in the past.

He is the first to admit that his surname, combining Russian with Latvian and roughly meaning "without a brain," is highly unusual.

"We're not sure how it came about, but we may have had an ancestor who pretended to be insane to avoid military service."

During the Holocaust, his grandparents fled east beyond the reach of the invading German army, only to return with the Soviet reconquest of Latvia.

Now a massage therapist, his father was a trainer and administrator of a soccer club in Riga. His mother was a mechanical engineer.

They decided to leave Latvia because of the burden of anti-Semitism and the desire to improve their lives and live in a free society.

Their original destination was the United States, but on a whim, they chose Canada. The "threat of war" dissuaded them from considering Israel, said Bezmozgis, an only child.

They arrived in Toronto in 1980, when Bezmozgis was six. It took him six months to learn English, and today, he does not consider English his second language. In the company of his parents, he converses in Russian.

Although he adapted to Canada long ago, he said he will always consider himself, in some sense, an immigrant here.

"My culture is not broadly Canadian. I feel a difference in intangible ways, though I don't feel like an outcast."

Ideally, Bezmozgis wants to pursue parallel careers in writing and filmmaking. "There are things in film you can't accomplish in fiction, and vice-versa."

A script he has written, set in Toronto and revolving around a Russian Jewish family like his own, is currently in development. He hastened to add it is not an adaptation of Natasha.

Success has not gone to his head. "I don't feel famous, at least in the larger world," he mused. "In the book world, it's a mixed blessing."

His biggest fear is that readers will focus on him, the new kid on the block, rather than on his sparkling collection of short stories. But he takes this in stride.

"That's the Catch-22 situation that's unavoidable."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP
President

18th century sleuth returns in A Spectacle of Corruption

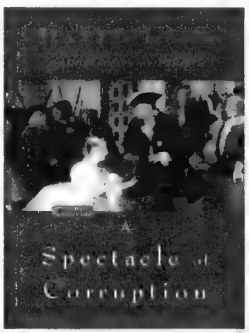
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Ever since Edgar Allan Poe, the detective has figured as a major archetypal hero in modern fiction. Literary detectives have emerged in so many personas and guises that there are now more than a minyan's worth of Jewish gumshoes in the bookshops, ranging from Howard Engel's Benny Cooperman to Harry Kemelman's Rabbi David Small. (An Internet search turns up several of the female variety as well.)

David Liss, author of the recently published A Spectacle of Corruption, offers us a memorable Jewish proto-detective in the character of Benjamin Weaver, a Sephardi Jew who acts as a roguish sleuth in the roughshod London of the 1720s.

A former boxer, Weaver becomes a self-employed "thief-taker," the nearest thing the crime-ridden city had to a municipal police officer.



A Spectacle of Corruption is a sequel to A Conspiracy of Paper, Liss's best-selling 2000 literary debut novel in which Weaver was introduced. The first book deals with the origins of the British stock market and events leading up to the infamous South Sea Bubble, the first major stock market collapse.

"This was the moment when stock speculation and investing in government issues moved out of the realm of the obscure and arcane business ventures that only a few people knew about to become part of popular culture," Liss told The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto.

A Spectacle of Corruption takes place a few years after the South Sea Bubble burst, when England was still mired in recession and the financial scandal was still casting a deep shadow over a volatile electorate.

It's a politically uneasy time, with the Whigs and Tories battling for supremacy and George I attempting to secure his hold on the throne.

The times were politically tenuous, Liss said, and corruption was rampant.

"There were things like voter clubs, in which hundreds of people would offer their block of votes to the highest bidder," said the American-born author, who lives in San Antonio.

In A Spectacle of Corruption, Weaver is convicted of a murder he did not commit, escapes from jail with the aid of some mysterious friends, and attempts to establish his innocence. That task proves difficult because the court system, moved by powerful unseen forces, is determined to find him guilty, no matter what evidence he presents in his defence.

"His first problem was how do you solve a crime when there's no evidence a crime has taken place? This was a time before inductive reasoning and circumstantial evidence were considered legally valid."

Liss had been studying 18th-century English literature at New York's Columbia University when he decided to write the first novel, whose great popularity all but ensured his career as a novelist. (Between the two Benjamin Weaver novels, he wrote The Coffee Trader, another immensely popular historical novel set in 17th-century Amsterdam.)

He decided to make Benjamin Weaver Jewish, he said, because he was intrigued by Anglo-Jewish figures from that era.

"I had done a lot of research about Jews in 18th century England and knew a lot about that," he said. "But I'm also very interested in various types of Jewish historical identities and historical periods.

"The 18th century is probably the first time in modern history where something like a Jewish secular identity is even remotely possible. The British were a pretty bigoted people, but the Jews had far more liberties in England than in any other European countries, and could integrate into mainstream British society in various ways."

An innovator of the financial historical thriller, Liss has done a thorough study of the English literary fascination with money and the connection often drawn between money and the Jews in early novels.

"The ways in which Jewish characters manifest in 18th-century novels offer a kind of personification of the changing role of money in consciousness," he said, adding that, as fictional characters, Jewish money handlers were often presented in a malevolent light.

But not always.

"In [Tobias] Smollett's novel Ferdinand Count Fathom [1753], there's a character, a Jewish financier, who is kind of a day-saver of the novel. So Jews appear not only as evil embodiments of money but also as benevolent embodiments of money."

A Spectacle of Corruption is published in hardcover by Random House and sells in Canada for $37.95.

Jewish medal winners highlighted in Jews and the Olympic Games

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

There is an old and tiresome stereotype that Jews are unathletic.

It grates on the nerves because some of the greatest athletes in modern times, from baseball and football players to Olympic champions, have been Jewish.

With the Summer Olympic Games in Athens just a week away, now is as good time as any to recall the exploits of Jewish Olympians.

Which is precisely what Paul Yogi Mayer, a sports journalist and former Maccabiah athlete, does in Jews and the Olympic Games, published by Vallentine Mitchell.

His timely book, which unfortunately tends to be on the dry side, covers both the Summer and Winter Games since the Olympics' modern resurrection in 1896.

By Mayer's count, Jewish athletes have picked up 416 medals, of which 179 have been gold, since 1896, mainly in fencing, swimming, athletics and gymnastics.

Not a bad haul.

According to Mayer, the youngest athlete at the 1896 games in Athens was 18-year-old Alfred Guttman (Hajos), who blew away the competition at two of the three swimming events.

Myer Prinstein, an American, placed first in the triple jump at the 1900 and 1904 Games in Paris and St. Louis.

And in 1906 in Athens, Jewish competitors, including the British fencer Edgar Seligmann, won a total of 11 medals.

In London, in 1908, Jews won 21 medals. Among them were members of the Hungarian sabre team and Danish footballer Harald Bohr.

At the 1912 Stockholm Games, Abel Kiviat and Alvah Mayer of the United States won silver medals in the 1,500 metre and 100 metres races.

Two Canadians, the boxer Albert Schneider and the wrestler Montgomery Herscovitch, won gold and bronze medals in 1920 in Antwerp.

And in Paris in 1924, the British sprinter, Harold Abrahams, who was immortalized in the Academy Award-winning film Chariots of Fire, finished first in the 100 metre race, the first and only Jew to win that event.

Another Canadian, Fanny (Bobby) Rosenfeld, one of the finest all-round athletes Canada has ever produced, won a silver in the 100 metres and a gold in the 400 metre relay race at the 1928 Amsterdam Games.

Irving Jaffee, the U.S. speed skater, won gold medals in the 5,000 and 10,000 metre races at Lake Placid in 1932. And at the summer games in Los Angeles that year, Jewish wrestlers, fencers and water polo players from Hungary walked away with gold medals, while Lilian Copeland of the United States won a gold medal in the discus throw.

Most Jewish athletes boycotted the 1936 Games in Nazi Germany, but Ibolya Csak, a high jumper, and Karoly Karpati, a wrestler, took gold for Hungary. Samuel Balter played for the victorious U.S. basketball team, while discus thrower Jadwiga Wajsowna of Poland was a silver medal winner.

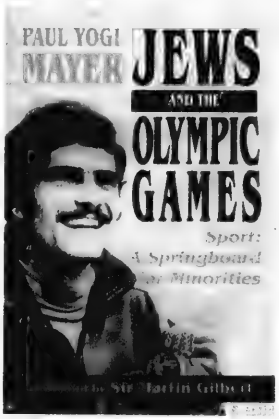
World War II interrupted the Games for 12 years, but in 1948, in London, Americans Frank Spellman and Henry Wittenberg won gold and silver medals in weightlifting and wrestling.

Jewish gymnasts triumphed in the 1952 Helsinki games – Maria Gorokovskaya and Mikhail Perelman of the Soviet Union. With six medals to her credit, Gorokovskaya became the first female to win so many medals in a single game.

The Hungarian gymnast Agnes Keleti, having previously won four medals, won three golds and two silvers in individual and team events in 1956 in Melbourne.

In Rome in 1960, British sprinter David Segal won a bronze medal in the relays, while U.S. weightlifter Isaac Berger took a silver, Brazilian Moyes Blas played on the bronze medal-winning basketball team and the Soviet Union's Irina Press won a gold in the 80-metre hurdle.

Vitaly Davidov was a member of the triumphant Soviet ice hockey team and Alain Calmat of France won the silver medal in figure skating at the 1964 Games in Innsbruck.



At the Tokyo Summer Games in the same year, Irena Kirszenstein (later known under her married name of Szewinska) won the silver medal in the 200 metre sprint, and Tamara Press of the Soviet Union won gold in the shot-put. Altogether, Jews won 29 medals in Tokyo, a record number.

Mark Spitz, the American swimmer, won two gold medals in Mexico City in 1968, and two Jewish athletes from the Soviet Union, Yevhen Lapinski and Valentina Vinogradova, were on its victorious men's and women's volleyball teams. In the 200 metre sprint, Irena Szewinska of Poland established a world record and won the gold medal.

The 1972 Munich Games were marred by the death of 11 Israeli sportsmen, but Mark Spitz won seven gold medals, a record yet to be equalled.

Szewinska, probably the greatest Jewish sprinter in history, won gold in the 400 metres race in Montreal in 1976. Two Soviet weightlifters, David Rigert and Valery Shary, were also gold medal winners.

At the 1980 Games in Moscow and Lake Placid, six Soviet Jews won silvers in shot-putting, yachting, handball and ice hockey.

And in Los Angeles in 1984, Mitch Gaylord of the United States won a gold medal in gymnastics, while Mark Berger of Canada finished third in the heavyweight judo event.

The American sprinter David Berkoff went home with a gold medal as the United States swept to victory in the 200 metre relay race in Seoul in 1988.

Two Israelis, for the first time, won medals when the Games were held in Barcelona in 1992 – Shay Oren Smadga and Yael Arad, both in judo.

In Atlanta in 1996, U.S. swimmers Lenny Krayzelberg and Brad Schumacher won gold medals in the 4x100 metre freestyle relay, while gymnast Kerri Strug of the United States won a gold medal despite an injury.

U.S swimmers Anthony Ervin and Dara Torres won gold and bronze in Sydney in 2000.

Now it remains to be seen how Jews will fare in Athens.

Israel's great wide Olympic hope

By HAIM SHADMI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Arik Ze'evi's shoulders are as wide as one would expect of a 100-kilogram judoka who carries the Israeli Olympic team's high hopes on his broad frame.

Ze'evi has been European champion in his weight category for three of the past four years, and was a silver medalist at this year's world championships. His colleagues worship him, and the Israel Olympic Committee (IOC) is counting on him for a medal, perhaps even Israel's first gold.

The question is whether Ze'evi's shoulders are wide enough to carry all of these expectations.

Coach Alex Ashkenazi and Ze'evi have been working together since 1997, with the exception of a two-year hiatus. Ashkenazi was Ze'evi's coach at the Sydney Olympics, where Ze'evi finished a disappointing fifth. Ashkenazi is considered tough to work with, but for Ze'evi he is a guru, and the judoka is willing to follow him blindly.

Ashkenazi says one of Ze'evi's problems is that he has short fingers that allow his opponents to shake free from his grip.

"Because Arik doesn't have a strong grip, he needs a lot more moves, since he has to know how to throw his rival from every position. He is now considered one of the best technical fighters in the sport. If Ze'evi wins five bouts, all of them will end with a different move."

Ze'evi's concentration can also be a problem, Ashkenazi says. Ze'evi needs to gain greater self knowledge, and his concentration tends to ebb and flow. At this year's European championships in Paris, however, Ze'evi took himself aside and came onto the mat at a peak level of concentration to take the gold.

Ze'evi used to have a strength problem, but Ashkenazi says he no longer loses bouts because of strength.

"Because he wasn't strong enough, he used to get injured a lot. On paper he is considered the strongest athlete in the sport after Kosie Inoue of Japan, but that's just on paper. Arik will win seven out of 10 bouts against an opponent one strength below him, but that still isn't 10-0, and one of the three bouts could fall in the Olympics," Ashkenazi says.

"Arik doesn't lose fights on strength anymore, but he still doesn't break his rivals the way I want him to."

A picture of Ze'evi hangs on the wall in the office of IOC psychologist Boris Bloomstein, with a personal inscription from the judoka: "Fast, calm, aggressive."

Ze'evi used to have a problem with aggressiveness and would pick up penalty points for passiveness, and that's where Bloomstein comes in.

"In order to solve the problem, we built a program specially for Ze'evi and put in a lot of hard work to deal with it," Bloomstein says.

"People ask how can you be calm and aggressive at the same time. In this instance, it means taking smart decisions."

Ze'evi's affirmations during the bout keep him sharp, confident, concentrated and aggressive.

Bloomstein, together with Prof. Michael Bar-Eli, the head of behavioral sciences and methodology at the Wingate Sports Institute, Israel's national Olympics training centre, has also developed a biofeedback device that Ze'evi is hooked up to while watching videos of his bouts, alternately practising relaxation and aggressiveness while Bloomstein tries to upset his concentration. Bloomstein also meets twice a week with Ze'evi while he is in training.

פריחה פראית מאת: אהרן אפלפלד

אמיליה פרוני, פסיכולוגית קלינית כתבה ביקורת נלהבת לספר בעיתון "הארץ". לדבריה, פריחה פראית הוא רומן בעל עוצמה אדירה, סיפור עשיר ורב-רובדי.

אני לא בדעתה אבל שיהיה. שיהיה כי אחרי הכול מדובר באהרן אפלפלד, סופר גדול ונערץ ומי אני שאחשוב אחרת.

GRILLED PINEAPPLE SUNDAE

1 pineapple, peeled, cored and cut into 1" slices
1/2 cup brown sugar
2 tblsps. melted butter
2 tblsps. lemon juice
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 gallon vanilla ice cream

Combine brown sugar, butter, lemon juice and cinnamon and mix until even. Brush mixture over pineapple slices. Place pineapple slice on preheated BBQ over a high heat and grill for about 1 minute per side or until browned. Remove from BBQ and immediately top with a scoop of ice cream and serve. These are best if the pineapple is warm when you eat it.

Money Matters

For the love of money

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Judaism has never looked askance at acquiring wealth. Without money, there can be no Torah, our sages declare, recognizing the absolute necessity of material comfort as a prerequisite for spiritual growth. As well, Jewish law insists that both our political and spiritual leaders (the king and kohen gadol) be wealthy, as impoverished leadership is undignified leadership, and, for better or worse, people tend to have much greater respect for those who possess wealth. We also daven three times a day for material blessings, and the Torah abounds with promises of material wealth if we follow the Torah's laws.

We all know that money, more than anything else, has the potential to, and so often does, create friction and discord. We have recently observed the most tragic holiday, Tisha b'Av. We continue to mourn and fast, seemingly oblivious to the fact that we have, despite its many difficulties, a thriving Jewish state – one that is strong, proud and affording every religious opportunity.

However, our Rabbis understood that sinnat chinam – benign indifference to the plight of other Jews – was the root cause of our exile, a feature that is all too common in Jewish life today. Interestingly, the Palestinian Talmud adds a nuance to this famous teaching, namely that "they loved money and hated one another in causeless hatred." The cause of friction between people was, and is, love of money. Money is crucial and is a wonderful blessing, but only as a means to an end: to enable us to focus on the more spiritual side of life and the creation of a just society based on Torah values.

We are bidden to love our neighbours, converts, our spouse and, above all, God. When one loves an object such as money, it, by definition, must replace love of people. The Babylonian Talmud, in a parallel statement, posits that Jerusalem was destroyed because people insisted on strict justice – too many disputes ended up in court and people were not willing to act beyond the letter of the law. This despite the fact our monetary policy was done strictly within the framework of Torah law.

Society can not endure unless people are willing to relent on money that may be due them. While money may be the root of all evil, its proper use is the harbinger of redemption.

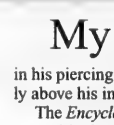
My friend Max, creature of God

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



Israel and the world are at war with terrorism. We are witnesses to genocide in Sudan and the maniacal murder of millions. And my dog, Max, is dying.

As I write this, I feel somewhat like a boy who slips into his war-ravaged home to rescue his fire truck. I am cognizant of the increasing anguish that afflicts humankind, and therefore question the intensity of suffering I should allow myself for an animal, not to mention the timeliness of this article. But my feelings for Max are as deep as a yawning well and my pain is very real. In short, life is a head-scratching series of uncertain choices. I hope mine are mostly reasonable.

Max is a majestic looking German Shepherd with a broadly protracted tail that lingers elegantly behind him. His right ear droops, contributing a certain dopiness to his demeanour. This is in contrast to the brilliance in his piercing brown eyes that sit confidently above his intimidating snout.

The Encyclopedia Judaica says Jews have an ambivalent relationship with dogs. We embrace them because, out of kindness, they "refrained from barking during the Exodus from Egypt," thereby preventing Pharaoh's soldiers from finding us in the darkness. Yet, we often abstain from having them as pets, because the sources say they are mean and should be chained up.

Max exhibits both characteristics.

He is kind to me, never barking upon my arrival home, always standing guard when his perceived enemies – the external noises of commerce or our well-intentioned landlord – come our way.

He is also a one-man dog who snarls at my visitors with a daunting canine inhospitality.

For those of you who have never had a pet, it might be difficult to appreciate the bond between us, and the sorrow animal lovers feel when a pet gets sick. Consider, however, the midrash that says Moses was chosen, in part, to save the Jewish people because of the considerable care he showed for his animal flock. The person-animal relationship is potent and has a noteworthy position in our investigation of truth.

I love Max because he is a brilliant creation of God, and because he is my friend.

As a creation of God, Max is perfect. His ability to smell is 60 times stronger than mine. He can sniff out sickness, warming his body against mine to help heal me. He hears sounds in the distant night, lifting his head and growling valiantly to fend off our foes.

As a friend, Max makes me laugh, like when he hides my keys or blocks my view of the TV to get my attention.

He would also keep an eye on me when we used to stroll along the cliffs behind the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, and he comforted me with the deliberate physical warmth of his quiet presence when David Rosenzweig, my brother-in-law, was killed.

I once heard that the etymology of the Hebrew word dog – kelev – is kol lev, all heart. Indeed. Max is 100 pounds of it. But soon I will likely have to make a decision for my aging kelev to go home.

When this moment arrives, like the natives who whisper thanks in the ear of their downed hunt, I will say to Max: "Goodbye, my friend. Thank you for your partnership and our beautiful companionship; for my silent self-importance knowing you were my loyal dog; for an education into animals – special enough creations to have their own floor on Noah's Ark, and the inimitable spirit you shared so unconditionally. One day we will walk together again where shalom is as high as the will can soar."

Today I pray for the well being of Israel, Sudan and the rest of the world. I then pray for the comfort of my dog, Max – a splendid creation of God.

Jewish population growing...older

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

As baby boomers age and people live longer, the number of Jewish seniors in Canada is expected to "explode" by nearly 40 per cent over the next 18 years, challenging virtually every aspect of community planning, warns a new report by UIA Federations Canada.

The number of Jewish elderly – those over 65 years old – is projected to climb to nearly 91,000 by 2021, a "dramatic" increase from the 61,875 Jewish seniors tallied by the 2001 census, says the report, part three of a series of demographic studies of the Jewish community based on the last national census.

91,000 seniors expected by 2021

The sharp rise in the projected number of Jewish seniors "points to a fundamental change in the demographic structure of the Jewish population in this country and has important ramifications for service planning and resource allocation for Jewish communities across Canada," writes the 52-page report's author and the study's research co-ordinator, Charles Shahar of Montreal.

While the report cautions that the projections are a "best guess," based on assumptions that seniors are living longer thanks to advancements in medical technologies and improved home care, it nevertheless sounds a warning to community planners that "new and innovative programs must continue to be established" to deal with the coming boom, despite current financial strains.

NEW ZEALAND CEMETERY VANDALIZED: New Zealand's Jewish community experienced its second serious anti-Semitic incident in less than a month when more than 90 gravestones were knocked over and a small chapel was destroyed by arson at Wellington's Makara Jewish cemetery last week. As well, swastikas were spray-painted on the walls of the destroyed building and etched on the grass between the graves. Three weeks ago, 16 graves were desecrated at another Jewish cemetery in Wellington. Please see news brief on page 2. [Mike Regan/Isranet photo]

Greek Jews heirs to a long tradition

By JEAN COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ATHENS — Although the largest Jewish community in Greece resides in Athens, Jews from Salonika – remnants of a once-thriving community – are still active and cohesive.

In Salonika, known in Greek as Thessaloniki, where 1,000 of the country's 5,000 Jews live today, the synagogue has a regular minyan and younger Jews gather at the local Jewish community centre.

5,000 reside in land of Olympics

But even these activities are a far cry from what Jews have meant to the city – and what the city has meant to Jews during the approximately 2,400 years of Jewish life in Greece.

The first Greek Jew whose name is known was "Moschos, son of Moschion the Jew," a slave identified in an inscription dated to approximately 300-250 BCE. The inscription was unearthed in Oropos, a small coastal town between Athens and Boeotia.

The Jewish community is believed to have grown further after the Hasmonean uprising, when many Jews were sold into slavery in Greece.

During the Hellenistic period, a Jewish community formed mainly in Thessaloniki, where Jews concentrated in an area near the city port. The centre of their social and religious lives was the synagogue.

Later, the Romans granted autonomy to the Jewish community, which was largely made up of traders, craftspeople, farmers and silk growers.

This ancient community came to be known as the Romaniotes, some of whose descendants still live in Greece today.

During the 15th and 16th centuries, many Jews expelled from Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sicily and France, as well as refugees from North Africa, settled in Salonika. Once there, the Romaniote and Sephardi communities founded separate synagogues.

Mandel Runs for Mayor

EDMONTON — Stephen Mandel, a city councillor and former head of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, has announced he's running to become mayor of Alberta's capital. If elected Oct. 18, he would become the city's first Jewish mayor, and only the second ever in Western Canada, after Sam Katz, the new mayor of Winnipeg. Before entering politics, Mandel, 58, was involved in real estate development and construction, as well as running hotels and sports enterprises. His main opponents are three-term incumbent Bill Smith and lawyer Robert Noce.

Fund Halfway to Goal

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has raised almost $22,000 – about half its $45,000 goal – to send 500 Israeli kids from Sderot, a target of frequent Palestinian rocket attacks, to summer camp. The Jewish Agency is making up the shortfall for now. The Afik Memorial Fund is named for Afik Ohayon-Zehavi, a three-year-old boy killed in a June attack. Spielberg Delays Film

NEW YORK — Director Steven Spielberg has postponed his movie about the hunt for 17 Palestinian terrorists who killed 11 members of Israel's Olympic team at the 1972 Munich Games. The New York Post reported last week that Spielberg is concerned Vengeance will inflame Muslim terrorists and turn the set into a target, particularly since one of the Palestinians is thought to still be at large.

Security for Israelis

ATHENS — A security fence has been constructed around the compound that will house Israeli athletes at the Athens Olympic Games. The barrier supplements security precautions already taken by Greece for the rest of the athletes and Olympic officials. The Games begin Aug. 13.

Reparations Extended

PARIS — France is extending reparation payments to people who lost parents as a result of Nazi crimes, the government announced. Payments have already been given to children of Holocaust victims, but survivors' groups in France have long backed restitution demands from former resistance movement members and for children whose parents in the resistance were killed or tortured during World War II. The payments are to be the same as those for children of French Holocaust victims. Recipients can choose either a lump sum of $33,000 or monthly payments of $550 (US).

Arrest in Book Thefts

PARIS — The head of the Hebrew section of France's national library was arrested on suspicion of stealing hundreds of historic books and documents. Michel Garel, 56, who has headed the department for 20 years, initially denied all charges, but later told an investigating judge he sold one of the works for $300,000 at a public auction at Christie's after forging authentification papers. Garel's wife is being investigated as an accomplice, since the couple allegedly bought an apartment with the money. The library's collection contains hundreds of works, including ancient Bibles, Talmuds and Torah fragments. It was initially commissioned by France's King Charles V in the 14th century and is regarded as one of the world's most important collections of Jewish writings. Police believe the thefts began in 1991.

N.Z. Cemetery Attacked

WELLINGTON — Assailants burned down a cemetery chapel and smashed more than 90 gravestones last Friday in New Zealand's worst-ever act of anti-Semitic desecration. The attack on a Wellington Jewish cemetery was the second since July 16, when authorities jailed two Israelis for trying to fraudulently obtain New Zealand passports. New Zealand says the men are Mossad agents. Jewish leaders said the attacks were spurred by diplomatic sanctions against Israel.

Argentine State Governor Faces Anti-Semitism

José Alperovich

BUENOS AIRES — The Jewish governor of an Argentine province was the target of anti-Semitic songs and graffiti.

The insults hurled at José Alperovich, the governor of Tucuman, were made during a July 30 protest by public employees battling for better salaries.

The DAIA political umbrella group for the Argentine Jewish community expressed anger over the incident.

"I believe the union protest for a salary increment is legitimate," said Jorge Kirszenbaum, a DAIA official. "But I guess the social protest loses value if it becomes a discriminatory and xenophobic expression."

Alperovich was travelling, but Tucuman's vice-governor, Fernando Juri, denounced the comments.

Peterborough shul appeals for funds after flood

Damage estimated at up to $60,000

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Peterborough's tiny Jewish community is asking the Jewish population at large for help following flood damage to the town's sole synagogue, estimated at up to $60,000.

To make matters worse, the Beth Israel Synagogue's insurance will cover only $15,000 in damages, because its coverage was capped after a flood two years ago.

The shul did not escape the widespread flooding that hit Peterborough last month. A record-breaking storm dumped some 200 millimetres of rain on the town, causing raw sewage and rainwater to flood dozens of homes and businesses. Current estimates assess the total damage at some $55 million.

A weary-sounding Larry Gillman, president of the 35-family congregation, told The CJN that the flood dealt the synagogue "a heavy blow."

Sewage and rainwater flooded the lower level, which houses a kosher kitchen, a meeting hall and storage space containing documents and other property, Gillman said.

The water also damaged all flooring, woodwork and drywall. Water resistant carpeting that was installed for $25,000 after a flood two years ago had to be ripped up and thrown away because it was contaminated by sewage.

Gillman said the health risks presented by the sewage have necessitated immediate clean-up.

No religious artifacts were damaged, he said, and there appears to be no structural damage to the 40-year-old building.

Meanwhile, no services are being held at Beth Israel because of the flooding and members are scrambling to make the building functional in time for the High Holy Days.

"Right now, we can't even use the washrooms because of drainage problems," Gillman said.

He said the community will have to take out a bank loan to begin paying for the clean-up.

"For such a small community, it will be a challenge to raise these costs. But at least the shul is still standing. A lot of our members were hit. Some of them lost their businesses and were forced out of their homes. They'll have to look after that first."

The lower level of a downtown building owned by a synagogue member was flooded to the ceiling, he noted.

Lost Israeli cat prowling Pearson

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's been well over a month, but Laura Elliott's cat has still not come back.

Somewhere on the grounds of Pearson International Airport, her three-year-old tortoise shell feline friend, Lily, is prowling around, hiding from airport ground crews and reverting to the life of a stray that Elliott rescued her from in Israel.

It was back in June that Lily made her bid for freedom, bolting from her cat cage in the cargo hold of an El Al jetliner as a ground crew opened the door to remove luggage from a flight arriving from Tel Aviv.

Lily had somehow managed to escape the confines of her cage while in the belly of the aircraft and made her dash to freedom when the first opportunity arose.

Elliott, meanwhile, is distraught, saying she is suffering mental anguish and is angry at El Al for failing to deliver her cat as she expected. She's also upset that El Al is denying responsibility for the incident and is instead shifting the blame for Lily's escape to her and to what it claims was a faulty cage.

Elliott, who returned to Toronto after five years living in the Jewish state, wants El Al to apologize, to compensate her for costs she incurred to transport Lily and costs she incurred after her escape, and to acknowledge its responsibility in the cat caper.

For its part, El Al believes it has done nothing wrong, that it has done all it contracted to do – transport Elliott's cat from Israel to Canada in an airplane cargo hold. It is no more El Al's fault that the cage was faulty than it would be if someone's luggage tore en route, said Stanley Morais, the airline's Canadian manager.

Meanwhile the case of the absconding kitty has made it onto local TV news shows and, Elliott believes, has given El Al a black eye. Elliott, a loyal El Al passenger for 25 years, wants the airline's customers to know how she was treated when she brought the incident to the airline's attention.

Morais counters by saying El Al has fulfilled its responsibilities and is not authorized to search for the cat in the airport.

For its part, the Greater Toronto Airports Authority, which runs Pearson, has set traps in an area under construction where the cat is believed to have been seen, Elliott said.

For Elliott, the incident brings her five-year stint in Israel to an unsatisfying conclusion. An ardent Zionist, Elliott first moved to Israel in 1996 and acquired citizenship. She moved there full-time in 1999, taking a job in the venture capital field in Tel Aviv. At the same time, she indulged her passion for stray animals, working as a volunteer with an animal rescue group and later rescuing animals on her own time and at her own expense.

There are thousands of street cats in Israel, she said, and while she helped many, she grew attached to two in particular. When she decided to return to Canada, she arranged to bring them back with her.

El Al charged here more than $200 (US) per cat to bring them as cargo – a price Elliott said she was more than willing to pay. At the check-in counter in Tel Aviv, she was told Lily's cage appeared adequate. At any rate, she had no choice, as there is only one kind of cat cage available in Israel, she said.

When only one of the cats showed up at the luggage carousel in Toronto, she raised her concerns about the missing animal.

"El Al should have secured the cage," she said.

Although it's unclear how the cat escaped, "It looks like the cage was not a great cage," Morais said.

"Miss Elliott is looking for an answer from El Al that we can't provide," he added.

As to responsibility for the missing cat, Morais said El Al's head office has confirmed the airline "has no liability, as it arrived at the destination."

"We are not responsible for a faulty cage or for the type of suitcase someone packs in."

Jewish Day School Alternative

Every Jewish parent wants the best Jewish education for their child, but Jewish day school is not always an option.

Beth Tikvah is offering a day school alternative for children who wish to continue their formal Jewish schooling. Our program focuses on teaching Jewish History, Tanach, Hebrew and Jewish culture - the cornerstones of Jewish knowledge - in a structured, formal environment, to help ensure that Jewish children receive the education they deserve.

Kosher kitchen flooded

"We really don't know how we will bounce back."

The synagogue's insurance coverage is only $25,000, with a $10,000 deductible.

The flooding presented a sudden setback for the congregation, which rode a crest of optimism for several weeks after a June announcement that it had reached a partnership deal with a local Unitarian church.

Years of talks with the Peterborough Unitarian Fellowship led to an agreement under which the church would use the synagogue as a Sunday and holiday worship space, as well as share costs.

Gillman said the income from the Unitarians will be welcome.

Dalia Margalit, director of development at Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, recently visited the synagogue with Peterborough-based Ve'ahavta volunteers.

"From the outside front of the shul, things looked relatively normal, but inside there were huge fans blowing down the stairs to dry out the social hall and kitchen," she reported. "One wall of drywall had to be removed, and the kosher kitchen had been flooded by backed-up sewage. A huge swatch of land was washed away from just beside the shul patio.

"It is heartbreaking to know that a Jewish community that is finding creative ways to survive has now been hit with a huge setback."

Anyone interested in helping with the clean-up can send donations to Larry Gillman, c/o Beth Israel Synagogue, 777 Weller St., Peterborough, Ont. K9J 6Y5.

Will Return

Japanese scholar Hirose is a Yiddishist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yoshiji Hirose, a professor of English literature and an authority on novelist Isaac Bashevis Singer, is that rarity of rarities – a Japanese person who reads, writes and speaks Yiddish.

Hirose, a professor of English literature at Notre Dame Seishin University in Okayama, was in Toronto last week to deliver a lecture in Yiddish at the Workman's Circle on Singer's enduring legacy.

He was accompanied by his 21-year-old daughter, a medical student. It was their first visit to Canada.

His host was Vivien Felsen, whose grandfather, Israel Medres, was a reporter, columnist and editor on the staff of the now-defunct Montreal Yiddish daily, Keneder Adler, for decades.

She was dumbfounded by Hirose's fluency in Yiddish.

"He was amazing. You could hear a pin drop," said Felsen, a Toronto translator and visual artist, referring to the audience's reaction.

A slight man in his late 40s, Hirose began learning Yiddish less than a decade ago. On a friend's recommendation, he took a Yiddish language course at Oxford University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

He was the only Asian and non-Jew in his class.

Although his English is more fluent than his Yiddish, Hirose's command of Yiddish is such that he has translated some of Singer's novels and short stories into Japanese.

Hirose, the president of the Jewish Literary Society of Japan, which promotes the study of American Jewish literature, is a member of an elite club of about 10 Japanese academics who are conversant in Yiddish.

Yoshiji Hirose

Having learned German before Yiddish, he had no problem picking up the pronunciation, but he is still working on it.

Acquiring a grasp of the Yiddish alphabet, which was totally alien to him, was quite another matter.

"It was challenging," said Hirose, who has twice visited Israel in the past 13 years and met colleagues at Hebrew University and Bar-Ilan University.

To his regret, he can only use his conversational Yiddish when he travels abroad and runs into Yiddishists like himself.

"All languages need practice," he said. "That's the hardest part for me."

Hirose, who has also translated the stories of Shalom Aleichem and Singer's older brother I.J. Singer into Japanese from English, has written several books on Yiddish literature.

The first, The World of Isaac Bashevis Singer, was published in 1985, and was followed a year later by Jewish American Literature.

In 1999, he translated Journey To My Father by Israel Zamir, Singer's son. Hirose met Zamir, an Israeli, in Japan and they became fast friends.

Later, he visited Zamir at his home on Kibbutz Aleph. Zamir neither speaks nor reads Yiddish, which Hirose finds ironic. But in a curious twist, Zamir's son married a Japanese woman.

Hirose's latest book, published in 2001, is The Symbolic Meaning of Yiddish, an analysis of the Singer brothers and American novelists Bernard Malamud and Cynthia Ozick.

Hirose stumbled on Yiddish fiction 30 years ago while studying comparative literature at the University of Washington in the United States.

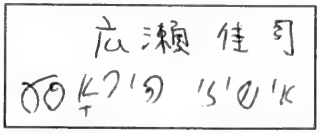
One of his teachers advised him to read Shosha, a Singer novel, and he was hooked.

"I felt some similarities between Japanese and Jewish culture," he explained. "The respect for parents. The strong sense of tradition and religiosity."

Strangely enough, Hirose never met Singer prior to his death in 1991. "I was afraid I would be disappointed," he said.

But after Singer's passing, he "met" Singer in a vivid dream in which the pair animatedly discussed the writer's prodigious body of work.

In 1993, he visited Poland, Singer's birthplace. To his surprise and disappointment, the trip did not enlarge his understanding of Singer. Before delving into Shosha – which he translated into Japanese from English in 1978, the year Singer won the Nobel Prize – Hirose's knowledge of Singer and of Jews was nil.



Yoshiji Hirose's name in Japanese and Yiddish, as rendered by Hirose

"We're quite ignorant of Jewish culture and history," Hirose said, referring to the Japanese.

And stereotypes about Jews abound in Japan. "Our image of Jews is that they're very smart and rich. That's it."

Anti-Semitism, however, is virtually nonexistent in Japan.

"It's not a problem. I don't think so. Ordinary people in Japan don't know anything about Jews. We did not have a historical relationship, or interactions, with Jews."

Japanese people, though, are acquainted with the Holocaust, partly because there are three Holocaust museums in Japan, he noted.

Reform Jews work up a sweat with Habitat

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Cheryl Englander, social action co-ordinator of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), has a new respect for construction workers.

After taking part in a recent Habitat for Humanity Toronto build in Toronto, Englander, also assistant director of the Association of Reform Zionists of Canada, says that she can now appreciate how physically demanding the work is.

She was part of a group of about 45 volunteers, including participants from the Central Conference of American Rabbis and representatives from the CCRJ that spent one day helping out on the build. This was the first time a Jewish group has partnered with Habitat Toronto.

Habitat for Humanity, a worldwide organization dedicated to eliminating poverty and homelessness, addresses a segment of the population that is not well served by either the subsidized or private housing markets, by helping them become homeowners.

The organization builds and sells houses to families who, in turn, contribute hundreds of hours of volunteer work, known as sweat equity, to the construction of their homes. The owners then repay an interest-free mortgage.

Mortgage costs are kept low by the use of volunteer labour, including skilled construction workers, and the donation of funds and building materials.

For this particular project, the largest ever in Canadian history, 40 townhomes will be built on one site, near Neilson Road and Highway 401.

Englander said that volunteers, many of whom are members of Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Sinai and Solel Congregation – her husband is Rabbi Larry Englander from Solel – ranged in age from 17 to seniors, including one pregnant woman.

"There was a job for everyone. They cut drywall, sawed wood, and if people were not comfortable climbing, there were jobs for them, as well. Everything was checked by professionals. These were people who had never stepped onto a building site. They accomplished a tremendous amount.

"We all came away from the day with a great feeling that we did something that will benefit others. It was backbreaking work, but it was a mitzvah to give people a leg up in society."

Shiri Yehoshua, CCRJ's regional director of youth and informal education, whose 17-year-old brother helped out, said some kids received social service hours needed to graduate high school by volunteering on the build.

Sharon Polansky, chair of CCRJ's national social action committee, said she would like to see the Reform community get together and participate in another build. "The community is committed to fighting powerlessness and homelessness across the country. There are builds going on in every city, and this is an exciting way to unify our work.

"There are different ways to help out. Groups can also get involved by providing lunches for the workers or raising money."

She said, "It is very moving when the houses are complete and people are handed the keys to their own home."

Cheryl Englander and her husband, Rabbi Larry Englander of Solel Congregation, spent a day working at a Habitat Toronto construction site, along with a group of volunteers from the Reform community.

New Conservative shul forms in Halton-Peel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Mississauga resident Sandra Rabin is eager to return to her Conservative Jewish roots, and more than a dozen local families are joining her in forming a new Conservative egalitarian congregation, B'Nai Shalom Congregation of Halton-Peel.

The fledgling shul will serve Jews in Mississauga, Oakville and Burlington, said Rabin, a native of Montreal who with her husband Ivan Ross has been affiliated with Oakville's Shaarei Beth El, a Reform temple, for more than a decade.

There are no Conservative congregations in the Mississauga or Oakville areas west of Toronto, although Shaarei Beth El used to be affiliated with both the Conservative and Reform movements.

Hamilton's Beth Jacob Congregation, which is Conservative, is a 30- to 35-minute drive from Mississauga, and about 20 minutes from Oakville.

After an initial meeting at the Oakville Recreation Centre in May, the group has been meeting in people's homes and has decided to hold religious services in their homes as well. They hope to have the first of their monthly Saturday services within the month, once they obtain a Torah.

Loretta Tanenbaum, executive director of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, is facilitating a long-term Torah loan from the Conservative umbrella organization. Tanenbaum, who became involved after a call from Rabin, has met with the group twice and also facilitated donations of prayer books.

Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto has provided chumashim, and Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont., where Ross' late parents were members, donated siddurim.

"It's a small group, but very keen. They're really ready to go, and it's exciting to be part of this," Tanenbaum said.

So far, the group includes a range of ages, from 30-something with children to septuagenarians. And already, it seems, the group has started to gel. At a recent meeting, people stayed after 11 p.m., even though speaker Rabbi David Seed had already left to return to Toronto, Rabin said. "You feel that sense of community, a warm, wonderful feeling."

She stressed that although she was the spokesperson for this article, "we do things as a group together. We decide everything together.

"We'd love to have new people join us for the High Holiday services," she added.

Rabin is looking forward to the more traditional type of services she has enjoyed in other Conservative congregations. The egalitarian aspect, while less traditional, offers "special meaning and you feel part of it," said Rabin.

In addition to religious services, plans include a separate monthly study session.

Tanenbaum is seeking a lay leader to run the services, but Rabin said that, if necessary, "we'll do it as best we can ourselves."

The group's next meeting is scheduled for this week, Thursday, Aug. 12, in Oakville. For more information, e-mail bnaishalom2004@yahoo.ca or call Loretta Tanenbaum at 416-667-1717.

Kosher food bank struggles to provide for Jewish poor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A package of farfel, one packaged soup mix, a can of light tuna, a can of chick peas, another of sweet peas and one of stewed tomatoes; sardines packed in tomato sauce, a box of macaroni and cheese, and a bag of bread, rolls and/or bagels, along with a few small danishes.

Volunteers at the Pride of Israel Synagogue's kosher food bank (one of two in Toronto) handed out 65 plastic shopping bags, one per family, containing those items or similar ones on a recent Wednesday morning. The number is typical, although it has been as high as 80 or 85 in the winter, said volunteer Katy Brass. A few parents with young children received boxes of cereal as well. Sometimes, there is peanut butter, pasta, and/or frozen chicken or turkey, but not this day.

"They say there aren't poor people in the Jewish community. I guess you have to do things like this to find out what's going on," said synagogue member Helen Bondar, a retiree who was filling in for another volunteer, checking the identification of recipients – who must be on government assistance to qualify – and handing out bags.

Most of the recipients are seniors. Many – because of the demographics in the Bathurst-Finch area – speak only Russian.

The food bank, which is open to recipients only on Wednesday morning – as is its counterpart farther south at Beth Sholom Congregation – closed down for more than a month this spring after a slowdown in donations of both food and money used to purchase food.

"We never have enough food. Never," said Helen Winer, a real estate agent who packs food bags once a week before her workday begins.

Susan Akler, the Pride's office manager who also serves as food bank co-ordinator, organizes the purchases every other week. Each order costs between $1,200 and $1,500, she said. "I have to restrict what I order."

Gefilte fish, for example, is too costly, noted Winer. Sometimes, however, it is donated during food drives, and they substitute it for less expensive tuna.

"During the winter, we were getting a lot of simchah baskets, but I haven't seen any in a while," said Brass, a retiree whose father, Mike Englishman, co-chairs the food bank with Alan Marks.

Their main sources of food and money are synagogue members, twice-yearly food drives at Beth Tikvah Congregation and Beit Rayim Synagogue, and donations from Grodzinski Bakery as well as Chai Kosher Poultry.

Any money that is donated is used only for purchasing food, not for operating costs, said Marks.

At 9:45 a.m., there is a lineup outside the door to the synagogue. "The last few times, we've given out 40 bags in 10 to 15 minutes," said Brass.

She opens the door at 9:57 a.m., allowing only a few people to enter at a time.

Akler, who has been involved with the food bank since its inception about a decade ago under the leadership of Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich and who has come to know the regular users, requests that a visiting reporter not interview them, in order to spare them undue attention. "This is a cause near to my heart," she said.

Englishman, a concentration camp survivor originally from the Netherlands, is pleased that the food bank has resumed operation and hopeful that it can continue. "I think I'm one of the few [here] who knows what real hunger means, and what malnutrition means," he said.

Dry Bones

JEWISH GRAVE DESECRATIONS IN NEW ZEALAND?!!
THAT DOES IT!
THIS YEAR WE ARE NOT VISITING NEW ZEALAND!!
BUT WE'VE NEVER EVEN THOUGHT OF GOING TO NEW ZEALAND!
TRUE.
BUT THIS YEAR WE HAVE A REASON!

Wrong decision

The Presbyterian Church (USA), with almost three million members, did not cover itself in glory recently when it became the first Christian denomination in the United States to join the divestment movement against Israel. At its annual general assembly in Richmond, Va., last month, the church, by a wide margin, rationalized its unfair motion by equating Israel with the old and justifiably hated apartheid system in South Africa.

The motion, though mainly applicable to companies whose profits from investments in Israel exceed $1 million (US) annually, is a worrisome development on two counts. Firstly, the church has an estimated $7 billion (US) in assets, no piddling sum by any stretch of the imagination. Secondly, the imposition of economic sanctions creates a precedent that others may yet emulate, and this is the real danger.

The church's decision to single out Israel was in keeping with its generally critical view of Israeli policies in the territories, some of which, admittedly, are open to debate. But in choosing divestment to signal its displeasure with Israel, the church has gone much too far and made a mistake of egregious proportions. As church elders should have realized, the path to peace between Israel and the Palestinians lies through bilateral negotiations and not through sanctions. Talks, broken off by the eruption of the second intifadah nearly four years ago, will resume when Israel concludes that a reliable and trustworthy Palestinian leadership, untainted by terrorism, has come to the fore. The Israeli government is unlikely to be swayed by foreign institutions seeking to weaken and isolate Israel at a time when its relationship with the Palestinians, and the Arab world at large, has reached a new nadir.

The motion is also objectionable because it is implicitly hypocritical. Is Israel is the only country in the Middle East whose policies are not above reproach? Where was the church's indignation over the atrocities being perpetrated by rampaging Arab militias in Sudan's Darfur region? The United Nations' Security Council has passed a resolution threatening Sudan with punitive measures if it fails to disarm and prosecute members of these genocidal militias. But has the church launched a divestment campaign in Sudan? Or has it pulled out investments in Arab countries, such as Syria and Saudi Arabia, that flout the principles of democracy, demean human rights and promote the wholesale and unmitigated hatred of the West and of Jews?

There is one last factor to consider. The attempt by the church to link Israel with the horrors of apartheid is a travesty of justice and, in terms of historical accuracy, an ineradicable falsehood. Apartheid, or institutional segregation based on race, does not exist in Israel, nor has it ever. Israel's desire to distance itself from the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip stems from insecurity rather than racism.

We take solace from the fact that the Presbyterian Church of Canada has not followed the lead of its sister church in the United States.

Caen, not Cannes

I wish to point out an error in the letter to the editor, "Canadian Jews helped defeat enemy" (CJN, June 24).

In the letter, the writer refers to "a battle with the Nazis in Cannes-Falaise," and then to "Normandy's Cannes-Falaise Gap."

Cannes is a town in the south of France. The town the letter-writer refers to is Caen, which is in Normandy, in the north of the country.

My late husband was wounded in Falaise in August 1944, and Falaise is situated three or four miles from Caen.

International movement honoured

Recently I had what I can only describe as the immense privilege of attending a ceremony in Ottawa at the home of the Swedish ambassador to Canada, Lennart Alvin. Two strong individuals, Vera Parnes, founder and president of the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity (RWIMH), and Vera Gara, representative of the RWIMH in Ottawa, were appointed as members first class of the Royal Order of the Polar Star, a high honour bestowed by King Carl XVI Gustaf of Sweden.

In choosing to honour these women, the king is recognizing the work of the RWIMH. His Majesty is implying that the work of this organization is imperative and timely. What this really means is that contemplating, striving for and sharing humanistic principles are effective and formidable in combating hatred and collective madness.

The RWIMH engages in active and responsible remembrance. It reveres the past, which is linked through its members to the possibilities inherent in the future. The event celebrated the movement's many achievements, including its exhibitions, conferences, bulletins and advocacy work. However, it was clear in the remarks of the recipients that there is much yet to be done and that the work itself has always been their primary reward.

I was very touched to be present at this ceremony, which increased my already high regard for Sweden and any country that holds aloft such a model as Wallenberg and celebrates those whose lives have been shaped and informed by his.

Be careful not to blame the victim

I am writing in response to Avrum Rosensweig's article "Is Jewish suffering inevitable?" (CJN, June 17).

Mr. Rosensweig, do you really believe that Jews can ward off or temper their suffering from anti-Semitism by making a gargantuan effort to discover and develop friendships and alliances with non-Jews around us?

Do you really believe that all or most Jews around the world are passively waiting hopefully and helplessly for the next calamity to overtake us?

Do you really believe that most of us Jews are entrenched in the role of victim as a consequence of our constant persecution down through the ages?

Do you really believe that any amount of "soul work" will strengthen our character in the face of anti-Semitism?

If these are your beliefs, then you shock and dismay me!

Nowhere in your article do you emphasize that anti-Semitism is evil – another of the countless manifestations of how evil presents itself in this world! The evil of anti-Semitism would exist even if there were no Jews. Anti-Semitism can never be routed until all human beings everywhere are taught to love and not to hate.

Through the ages, all over the world, there have been evil people. It is no different today. Right at this moment, in every country in the world, there are countless numbers of evil people who would enthusiastically volunteer for guard duty in concentration camps and to torture whomever they are "ordered" to torture. The evil mind is not limited to any particular race, creed or colour, nor to any particular social or economic class. The evil mind can be found among professionals, white and blue collar workers, skilled and unskilled workers, rich and poor, religious and secular.

Anti-Semitism is not a Jewish problem. There is nothing any Jews can do, individually or collectively, with or without "soul work," that will help them cope with it! Jews don't need anti-Semitism to help them develop strength of character! There are many more life experiences, other than pure evil, that test the mettle of men.

I don't pretend to have any answers as to how we can ever eradicate evil. But perhaps we must begin by never, ever, under any circumstances, suggesting that the victims of the evil of anti-Semitism might be able to prevent the unleashing of this scourge were they only to take "this" or "that" action, were they only to adopt "this" or "that" attitude!"

By suggesting this, Mr. Rosensweig, you are victimizing the victim.

When you do this, you are empowering the anti-Semites. All they need to initiate their unspeakable crimes on humanity is the formal or tacit consent of a community or a country. Evil eternally lies in wait to hear and to receive that consent.

Your article, Mr. Rosensweig, appears to me to be giving that consent!

Jewish theology and the Gaza withdrawal

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

One of the most hotly debated subjects in Israel today is the proposed Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and the presumed concomitant evacuation of thousands of Israeli citizens, many of whom have been living in Gaza for more than one generation.

The conundrum that Israel finds itself in is truly vexing. Governing Gaza and its population of more than a million Arabs has proved to be nearly impossible. Removing 7,000 Jews from their homes – many were actually encouraged by previous Israeli governments to move to Gaza because of the ostensible security benefit involved in such settlements – is a drastic and difficult thing for any Israeli government to ponder, let alone to carry out.

The debate about the proper course of action has involved many factors. Recently a new consideration has been introduced into the discussion: theology.

Generally, in religious circles in Israel today, the dominant theology is that of Rabbi Zvi Yehudah Kook (1891-1982), the only son of the first chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook. Rabbi Kook the younger was the spiritual force behind the Gush Emunim movement. He opposed, on theological grounds, any Israeli withdrawal from territories captured by the Israel Defence Forces (even the withdrawal from Sinai 25 years ago). The process of God's redemption of the Jewish people was, according to Rabbi Zvi Yehudah, being revealed before our very eyes in the military successes of the IDF. Refusing to accept the gifts God has given to us would be a form of sacrilege. There is a mitzvah, a religious duty, to capture the land and not to abandon it to the hands of others, he believed.

But an interesting new religious voice has now been heard on the issue of withdrawal. Rabbi Amnon Bazak would seem to have all the credentials of a Gush Emunim spokesperson. He teaches at the Har Etzion (Hesder) Yeshivah and has lived in the West Bank, in Alon Shvut, for most of his life.

Rabbi Bazak presents his new thesis in a publication from his yeshivah directed to yeshivah boys now serving in the army (his article can be found on the Web in Hebrew at www.etzion.org.il/dk/5764/967mamar2.htm). Rabbi Bazak comments on the Torah portion Shlach, which tells the story of the 10 unbelieving spies sent by Moses to scout out the land (Numbers 13:1-14:38). Often, Rabbi Bazak argues, the contemporary spin that is given to the story in religious circles is that the spiritual descendants of the ten unbelieving spies and their followers are those contemporary Israelis who are committed to the idea of settling the land only if it can be done with ease, not if it involves sacrifices and taking chances. The minority who have the ostensibly proper attitude to settlement today are understood to be the spiritual followers of Moses and Caleb and Joshua, whose belief in God allowed them to pursue the settlement of Canaan even against great odds, since they trusted in God's promise to the Israelites.

Rabbi Bazak, however, argues that this popular homily is based on a very selective reading of the Bible. Immediately after the biblical story of the unbelieving spies, we find the narrative about the ma'apilim, those overly confident Jews who attempted to settle the land at an inappropriate time (Numbers 14:39-45). Their zeal to capture the land at a time when God did not want them to do so led to disaster.

The only reasonable conclusion from the biblical texts, according to Rabbi Bazak, is that there are times when conquest and settlement are appropriate and times when they are not. Then, Rabbi Bazak develops the more controversial part of his thesis. How, he asks, are we to divine whether we ought or ought not to be pursuing settlement and conquest, even at great risk?

According to Rabbi Bazak, when we do not have direct communication from God to tell us whether fighting for our settlements is what is called for right now, it is best to study what the Bible tells us about other periods in Jewish history.

He notes that the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel both lived (around 2,600 years ago) in a period when large numbers of Jews felt that their rights to the land were granted by God and, accordingly, were certain that they should be fighting against the extremely powerful Babylonians to protect their territories. They were equally certain that God would surely grant them victory. Most of their religious leaders encouraged them to think that way. Jeremiah, a minority voice crying out in the wilderness, told them not to fight for their God-given right to the land. Ezekiel explained further that their right to the land was not inalienable. It was contingent on moral uprightness. He chastised the people sarcastically, "You eat with blood, you raise your eyes to your fetishes, and you shed blood – yet you expect to possess the land! You have relied on your sword, you have committed abominations, you have all defiled other men's wives – yet you expect to possess the land!" (Ezekiel 33:25-26)

Rabbi Bazak poses the following poignant question: can we be so confident of our own moral uprightness that we can state with certainty that God is guaranteeing our success in settling Gaza? Lacking such certainty, should we not leave decisions about withdrawals to military and political experts and not to the people's spiritual guides? Rabbi Bazak heaps scorn on those Israeli rabbis who were so certain of what it was that Judaism demanded that they composed a prayer for the success of the "No" vote in the recent Likud referendum on the withdrawal. He raises his eyebrows at the statement of the chief rabbi of Gush Katif that the successful "No" campaign was a manifestation of "a great and sublime revelation from God of the grace that He has shown us before the entire world."

Rabbi Bazak passionately presents his own view that contemporary rabbis in the State of Israel have generally chosen to get involved in public discourse on the wrong issues. He castigates his colleagues (the leaders of the religious Zionist community) who, he argues, never go to the ramparts to fight for any cause other than the retention of territory. "Religious Zionism has not gone out to the streets on any other issue – not to fight against public desecration of the Sabbath; not against the abysmal depravities of the media; not against the severing of Israeli society from Jewish and ethical values; not against economic distress and social stratification; not against the [negative] attitudes to immigrants and foreign workers." The pride of place given to the fight over retention of the land is, Rabbi Bazak writes, "a distortion of religion and of halachah."

Not surprisingly, Rabbi Bazak's thesis has hardly won over the entire religious community. One of his colleagues in Alon Shvut, Rabbi Yaacov Meidan, wrote a strong rebuttal in the same publication (Rabbi Meidan's article can also be found on the Web in Hebrew, at www.etzion.org.il/dk/5764/968mamar2.htm). Among his other arguments, Rabbi Meidan cannot tolerate the idea that decisions about the future of Eretz Yisrael should be left in the hands of people who, according to him, lack sufficient respect for, and belief in, the Jewish connection to the Land of Israel. "To my mind there would be nothing just, nothing righteous and nothing truthful about assigning responsibility about decision-making [about withdrawing from territories] to people who are moved to tears by the destruction of a few dozen [Arab] houses in Rafiah – most of which were slapped together in a few days with hardly any work – but who are willing to destroy the childhood landscape and the dreams of thousands of dedicated [Jewish] settlers."

It is unclear how much significance should be read into Rabbi Bazak's position, as Rabbi Meidan's is still the dominant approach of the religious Zionist community. But the recent redefinition of the debate within religious Zionism is certainly a salutary development. It is hardly useful to portray the question of withdrawal simplistically as a disagreement between those who believe in the Bible and those who do not. Voices such as those of Rabbi Bazak – a man who has dedicated his life to settlement, Torah and religious Zionism, and yet wonders aloud whether settlement is the way to continue right now – have encouraged Israeli society to think about the connection between theology and territory in new and unexpected ways.

The redemptive art of mourning

Tragedies don't have silver linings. They are black holes of sadness filled with pure pain. There is nothing good about death and destruction. Considering this, it would make sense for us to push tragedies out of our minds. So why do we Jews focus on catastrophes?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

We have days of mourning for the various traumas of our history: exile, the destruction of the Temples, internecine strife and the Holocaust. Even on the holidays, we say Yizkor, a memorial prayer for family members who have died. We continually pick away at old wounds, repeatedly recalling our saddest moments.

Why not forget? Some selective amnesia could make our lives, and our history, a lot more palatable. We could "move on," and stop paying attention to dead relatives. We could consider the Holocaust, the Inquisition, the Crusades, and all the exiles and expulsions to be part of the irrelevant past, events that could only interest historians. In so doing, the uncomfortable burden of Jewish history would finally be lifted off our shoulders. Perhaps we might even be happier.

Yet we make a point of revisiting our national and personal traumas. We do so because mourning is not merely a form of suffering – it can be also be a supremely creative act. There is a Jewish art to mourning. It is actually a form of alchemy, allowing us to take the emptiness of suffering and transform it into redemption.

How does this happen? Firstly, we must realize that discomfort is not so bad. Who will change the world? The complacent, with their suburban homes and RRSP's? Serious change always begins with righteous anger. We revisit dark moments to remind us that in the presence of evil, complacency is the same as complicity.

Even sadness can spur a positive response. Excess sadness can be extremely dangerous and lead to debilitating depression. Yet the art of mourning can also find a positive use for sadness. This is best expressed by the verse, "And you shall love the stranger, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt." The newly freed slave may not become a master. He must become an abolitionist. The Torah is teaching us that the response to tragedy may not be depression or cynicism or hatred; the only correct response is compassion. Rather than feeding an endless cycle of violence, the suffering stranger is commanded to transform his anguish into love.

Tragedy and suffering in and of themselves are empty and meaningless. But it is still possible to offer a meaningful response to suffering. The art of mourning is to use tragic memories as a road map for fixing the world. In this way, the art of mourning becomes the first step on the road to redemption.

Fence abstention betrays Canadian values

What does Canada have in common with Cameroon, El Salvador, Nauru, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Tonga, Uganda, Uruguay and Vanuatu? These cowardly countries abstained when the UN General Assembly condemned Israel's security fence last month. Canada, apparently, has no opinion on the compelling moral issue of a country's right to construct passive defences against suicide bombers. Facing the scourge of terrorism, the Canadian moose again resembled a mouse. Canadians should be ashamed. Canadian Jews, who just voted overwhelmingly for the Liberal party, should feel betrayed.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Insiders insist the abstention represents great progress – at least Canada resisted joining Europe's diplomatic lynching of Israel. Yet such Bontsha-Shveigism is demeaning. Bontsha the Silent was a fictional eastern European Jew who only asked God for bread, nothing else. That approach characterized European Jewry before Zionism taught the virtues of self-respect, and before the Holocaust taught the need for self-defence. We North Americans are too proud, too free, to accept morsels. All of us opposed to terror – Jewish and non-Jewish – and infuriated by the UN's anti-Israel obsession need to roar.

We need to chide the government for this farcical non-vote. We need to challenge everyone in the Liberal party who vowed that Prime Minister Paul Martin would be more muscular and moral in repudiating Arafatism than Jean Chrétien. We need to encourage Liberal bagmen to put future party contributions in escrow until Martin spearheads the anti-terror fight.

I understand that anger is passé in Canada, that nervous nellies oversimplifying certain pricey polls insist anger is counter-productive when defending Israel to Canadians. But what movement against injustice ever triumphed without anger, especially when justified and strategically deployed? How would Martin Luther King Jr. and the civil rights movement have succeeded, and how would Anatoly Sharansky and other Soviet dissidents survived, without righteous indignation? Without consulting pollsters, the great humanitarian Elie Wiesel teaches that amid renewed anti-Semitism and the world's acceptance of Palestinian terror, anger is a logical response.

The pollsters caution us to "speak Canadian" when defending Israel. I agree. Let's talk Canadian. How about Canadians' commitment to justice? Shouldn't Canadians complain that the International Court of "Justice" (ICJ) degenerated into a politicized kangaroo court of anti-Israel dictatorships judging Israel? And how about Canadians' commitment to balance? Shouldn't Canadians object that the ICJ downplayed the motivation for the fence – systematic Palestinian terrorism?

How about Canadian proportionality? Shouldn't Canadians resent that in picking on Israel, the UN human rights mechanism ignores the slaughter of thousands in Sudan, the death of millions in Congo, the oppression of tens of millions by the Palestinian Authority and many other Arab countries? And how about Canadian fair play? Why can Americans pulverize terrorists from the air, England can chase IRA terrorists willy-nilly and former prime minister Pierre Trudeau can mobilize the military against FLQ kidnappers, but Israel can't build a security barrier – which is 93 per cent fence – to stop attacks on buses, bat mitzvahs, schools, seders and synagogues?

How about Canadians' commitment to peace and the often overlooked detail that the Palestinians rejected land for peace at Camp David in 2000, choosing violence instead of negotiations, as they have since 1947. How about Canadians' devotion to international mechanisms of justice and how demonizing Israel and rationalizing Palestinian terrorism, corruption and gangsterism have undermined the legitimacy of the ICJ, the UN General Assembly, the UN, and other international organizations? Finally, how about the Canadian commitment to human rights, which must acknowledge Israel's rights to defend Israeli citizens while rebuking the Palestinian Authority for oppressing women, gays, Christian and dissidents.

I write from Jerusalem, where my family and I are enjoying the summer. For the first time in years, thanks to the security fence, the streets of Jerusalem are clogged with people. In Tulkarm, Jenin and other Palestinian cities, nightlife is returning and the economy is improving, thanks again to the security fence.

The UN can spin its wheels. The Palestinians can continue seeking paper victories in kangaroo courts while destroying their own society through a political culture addicted to hate and chaos. And Canada can join Tonga in dodging today's compelling issues. Meanwhile, Israelis understand that living well – and safely – is the best revenge.

Film fest offers window on Israeli life

Last month's Jerusalem Film Festival offered a snapshot of contemporary Israel: The matsav – the fear of violence and the concomitant downtrend in tourism – has minified such festive Jerusalem events as the annual crafts fair, moved from its usual location in the Sultan's Pool to the downtown pedestrian triangle, in much-diminished form. The film festival, in contrast, took place at its traditional venues: the two screening rooms of the picturesque Cinematheque, overlooking the walls of the Old City, and several nearby satellite theatres. There were fewer foreign tourists in attendance, and Israelis from elsewhere hesitate to visit Jerusalem, but the festival remained undiminished as large numbers of local film buffs attended multiple screenings.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The event draw a wide and varied audience: women with sheitels, 20-something men with multiple piercings, hip Shenkin girls in low slung jeans, Muslim women in traditional head-covering, men with white beards and kippot, and Birkenstock-wearing students.

The films give claustrophobic and turmoil-weary Israelis the opportunity to indulge in cinematic tourism. Works from France, Germany, the Czech Republic, Belarus, Thailand, Japan, North Africa and even Canada offer intimate contact with other cultures, if only briefly in a darkened theatre. Audiences can luxuriate in the exotica of Cuban music, thwarted love in Sri Lanka and coming of age in Iran. Indeed, a packed theatre applauded the watery clime of eastern Quebec in the award-winning La Grande Seduction. For a modest investment of time and money, this virtual tourism refreshes the spirit.

Films also offer immigrants traces of a lost home, a familiarity of language and culture missing in their new country. Obscure literary and political references and incomprehensible subtitling were no barrier to the largely Russian immigrant audience that gathered to watch Reprise, a Russian documentary about the last days of Stalin and his unfulfilled plan to murder the Jews of Russia.

At other screenings, Israelis looked to understand their neighbours, such as in Control Room, a slyly seductive film about the Al-Jazeera Arabic-language news channel, and in films about refugee camps in Gaza and the construction of the barrier between Israel and the West Bank. As it has for years, the flourishing Israeli film industry offers possibilities for introspection, social critique and political analysis, with feature films providing intimate glimpses of haredi, mizrachi, Israeli Arab and Palestinian life.

Notable was the intense interest in two new documentaries, each about an Israeli writer known for literary representations of the Holocaust. Appelfeld's Table, about the Hebrew writer Aharon Appelfeld (Badenheim 1939, Iron Tracks), and Ida Fink: Traces, about the writer whose stories (A Scrap of Time, The Journey, Traces) have been translated from Polish into Hebrew, played to sold-out crowds.

Both films drew on extensive interviews with the writers by a young admirer. Appelfeld's Table, awarded the prize for best film on the Jewish experience, grew out of a series of conversations between the writer and the film's producer at the café of the Anna Ticho Museum (Beit Anna Ticho) in downtown Jerusalem, where Appelfeld writes on a daily basis at his regular table.

Traces emerged from Fink's vacation trip to the Galilee, accompanied by a young Israeli literature student and writer. Fink's admirer makes the case that her writing be considered part of Israeli literature – indeed, Hebrew literature – despite the fact Fink, who lives in Israel, writes in Polish and deals exclusively with the European past.

In Appelfeld's case, the filmmaker invites the writer to speak not only about his personal history and the European catastrophe that underlies all of his oeuvre, she also draws him into a conversation about the development of personal and national identity.

Most unexpected was the relatively young age of the audiences for both films, and the large numbers of people seeking tickets to see them.

Both writers initially had difficulty finding publishers, partly because of their focus on the everyday aspects of atrocity and trauma. Until recently, Israelis distanced themselves from such reflections, preferring heroic stories of partisans and ghetto fighters. The contents and the popularity of these two films about writers of the Shoah capture the growing engagement of young Israelis with the Holocaust and the Diaspora past, more generally – a sign of the rethinking of Israeli identity in the present.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Here, for your summer reading pleasure, is a cornucopia of eclectic books, published in the last little while...

Israel Medres, a Russian Jew born in 1894, immigrated to Canada in 1910. After stints as a stevedore and tailor, he turned to journalism, joining the staff of Montreal's Yiddish daily, Keneder Adler, in 1922. For the next 40 odd years, Medres was a reporter, columnist and editor. In Between the Wars: Canadian Jews in Transition (Vehicule Press), originally published in 1964 and now translated from the Yiddish by Vivian Felsen, Medres uses his considerable talents as an essayist to comment on events from the 1920s to the 1940s. A companion volume, Through the Eyes of the Eagle: The Early Montreal Yiddish Press 1907-1916 (Vehicule Press), translated by the late David Rome, deals deftly with a wide variety of topics.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Leo Kolber, the Montreal-born financial wizard and politician, has had an eventful life. He has managed the Bronfman family trust, served in the Canadian Senate and met a plethora of fascinating personalities. In Leo, a Life (McGill-Queen's University Press), an engaging book co-written with L. Ian MacDonald, Kolber recounts his relationship with the Bronfmans and other business tycoons and his association with Canada's Liberal party.

Yaacov Zipper, the principal of Montreal's Jewish Peretz School from the 1920s until his retirement in 1972, kept a diary. Its contents, distilled in The Journals of Yaacov Zipper, 1950-1982 (McGill-Queen's University Press), have been translated from Yiddish and edited by Mervin Butovsky and Ode Garfinkle. It's a refreshingly frank retrospective look at a Jewish community that has never stopped evolving. Miriam Bassin Chinsky's The Tailor's Daughter (Multimedia Nova Corporation) is a delightful reminiscence of Toronto in the 1930s and 1940s.

In A Jew in America (HarperCollins), an intellectually bracing book, Arthur Herzberg, the distinguished American rabbi and historian, recalls his boyhood, delineates the formation of his Jewish identity and his initiation into the rabbinate, comments on Jewish politics in the United States and gives his impressions of developments in Israel. In a similarly rigorous work, American Judaism (Yale University Press), Jonathan Sarna explores how Judaism has adapted to a new land and how American culture has affected Jewish religious practice. Jane Kaplan, in Interfaith Families: Personal Stories of Jewish-Christian Intermarriage (Praeger), looks closely and empathetically at couples who have entered into mixed marriages.

Shalom Goldman, in God's Sacred Tongue: Hebrew & the American Imagination (University of North Carolina Press), skillfully examines how a procession of Christian scholars and intellectuals interpreted Hebrew texts from the colonial period to the 20th century.

Diane Wolkstein's Treasures of the Heart (Random House Canada) renders oral legends into ancient biblical texts and thereby creates new stories within the framework of Jewish holidays. In a similar vein, Elie Wiesel, in Wise Men and their Tales (Random House Canada), gives us his particular take on the lives of chassidic rabbis, talmudic scholars and biblical figures. In Jewish Passages: Cycles of Jewish Life (University of California Press), Harvey Goldberg explains how Jews balance the past and present in the observance of customs and rituals. Five Cities of Refuge (Random House Canada), by Lawrence Kushner and David Mamet, offers readers original glimpses into key verses in the Torah. P.S. Berg, dean of the Kabbalah Centre, decodes the Kabbalah's intricate teachings in The Essential Zohar (Random House Canada). Douglas Rushkoff, in a hard-hitting and provocative polemic, Nothing Sacred: The Truth About Judaism (Random House Canada), claims that Judaism teeters on the abyss of irrelevancy. The subtext of Yaakov Malkin's challenging Secular Judaism: Faith, Values and Spirituality (Vallentine Mitchell) is that Jewish religious tradition does not recognize any "obligatory credo." Rabbi Chaim Rapoport, in Judaism and Homosexuality (Vallentine Mitchell), articulates an Orthodox view of this issue, balancing a commitment to Jewish law with an "understanding perspective."

The Ultimate Bar/Bat Mitzvah Celebration (Random House Canada), by Jayne Cohen, should be mandatory reading for parents.

Herold Weiss' A Day of Gladness (University of South Carolina Press) eruditely compares how Jews and Christians of antiquity viewed the Sabbath. Michele Murray, in Playing a Jewish Game (Wilfrid Laurier University Press), claims that significant strands of early Christian anti-Judaism were in fact directed against Gentile Christians. Benjamin Isaac, in The Invention of Racism in Classical Antiquity (Princeton University Press), refutes the common belief that the ancient Greeks and Romans were immune to racial prejudice.

The conventional view is that the Jewish experience in Spain in the century before the expulsion of the Jews in 1492 was one of persecution and despair. In A Jewish Renaissance in Fifteenth-Century Spain (Princeton University Press) Mark Meyerson revises this orthodoxy by focusing on the town of Morvedre.

The behind-the- scenes story of Operation Solomon, the 1991 airlift of Ethiopian Jews to Israel, is told compellingly by Asher Naim, Israel's ambassador in Ethiopia during that period, in Saving the Lost Tribe (Random House Canada). Judging by his sympathetic portrayal of Jewish faces and his penchant for Jewish themes, Rembrandt, the great Dutch painter, had friendly relations with Jews. Steven Nadler, in Rembrandt's Jews (University of Chicago Press), elegantly explores this topic.

The Holocaust and its aftermath: Through a carefully calculated plan turning on a blend of ethnic pride and racial fear, Nazi Germany prepared the ground for genocide. Claudia Koonz, in The Nazi Conscience (Harvard University Press), elaborates on this theme in this thoroughly researched book. And in Architects of Annihilation (Princeton University Press), Gotz Aly and Susanne Heim explain how the Nazis used young careerists to build the Holocaust's ideological and material infrastructure.

The three Bielski brothers of what is now Belarus defied the Nazis by building a thriving makeshift community in the forest and by courageously fighting back. Their oft-told story is related by Peter Duffy in The Bielski Brothers (HarperCollins). When Bela Zsolt published his remembrances of the Holocaust shortly after 1945, the phrase "Holocaust literature" had yet to be devised. In Nine Suitcases (Jonathan Cape), a taut chronicle of cruelty and betrayal, he relates his travails as a forced labourer in Ukraine. Miriam Akavia's An End to Childhood (Vallentine Mitchell), written as fiction but based on fact, is a harrowing tale of survival in Lvov. Holocaust City (Routledge), by Tim Cole, describes the making of the Budapest ghetto. In The Gold Train (HarperCollins) and The Twentieth Train (Grove Press), Ronald Zweig and Marion Schreiber, respectively, write about a special train that enabled a select group of Hungarian Jews to leave the Holocaust behind them and the first and only attack on a death train heading toward the Auschwitz concentration camp. Originally published in German, People in Auschwitz (University of North Carolina Press) is by Hermann Langbein, a half-Jewish Austrian Communist who was interned there in 1942, and who meticulously describes its brutal routines and inhuman degradations. Pamela Shatzkes' Holocaust and Rescue (Valletine Mitchell) details the lengths to which Britain's Jewish community went to try to save and provide humanitarian relief for European Jews caught up in Hitler's vise.

The end of the war found thousands of non-German Jews in Germany, where they rebuilt their pre-war social and cultural networks. Hagit Lavsky investigates this facet in New Beginnings: Holocaust Survivors in Bergen-Belsen and the British Occupation Zone in Germany, 1945-1950 (Wayne State University Press). The attempt by Germans to come to terms with the Holocaust and to repudiate anti-Semitism are the interlocking themes of Anthony Kauders' never less than interesting Democratization and the Jews: Munich, 1945-1965 (University of Nebraska Press).

In The Terrorist Next Door (Thomas Dunne Books), Daniel Levitas, an expert on white supremacist and neo-Nazi groups in the United States, studies a dangerous phenomenon all too often ignored since Sept. 11, 2001 – the radical right and the militia movement.

In general: The Oxford History of Western Art (Oxford University Press), by Martin Kemp, is a beautifully crafted compendium. Rosemary Lord's Hollywood Then and Now (Thunder Bay Press) is a handsomely illustrated history of California's movie industry. New York City (HarperCollins) is a photographic tribute to the Big Apple. The Canadian Landscape (Firefly) celebrates the diversity of this country through J.A. Kraulis' sharp and evocative photographs. In Algonquin Seasons (Firefly), Michael Runtz, in vivid words and photos, explores an iconic Ontario provincial park. Canada's Classic Fishing Lodges (Boston Mills Press) is a photographic tour-de-force from Mark Krupa and Donald Standfield. Lonely Planet's travel guides, Montreal, Toronto and Hidden Los Angeles, are terrific. In light of Lance Armstrong's sixth consecutive Tour de France victory, read Gilbert King's The Bicycle (Firefly), an entertaining history of this ingenious contraption. Movie fans will enjoy Bill Stern's You Don't Have to be Jewish (Lugus), a compilation of reviews about films with Jewish content.

Consultancy promotes ethics, social responsibility

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

A tool for investors, consumers, government agencies and businesses, EthicScan is Canada's oldest and largest full-service ethics consultancy.

Founded in 1988 by David Nitkin, who at the time felt corporate ethics would be a significant issue in the future, EthicScan has given organizations and individuals the opportunity to act according to their highest principles and values.

The company was established as a fee-for-service practice and, from its inception, has empowered clients with the information needed to benchmark their performance, Nitkin said.

"If you're a consumer, this would be information on the performance of companies behind the product. If you're an investor, this would be information of a sensitive nature about the practices of a company, including its participation in the Arab anti-Israel boycott or its involvement in human rights abuses. If you're a company, it's a chance to look at how other companies are responding to good governance, human relations, human resources and other kinds of challenges in the workplace. And if you're a crown corporation, a government department or an integrity commission, it's a chance to be as reputable in public services as possible," he said.

Today, EthicScan has grown to a team of nine consultant associates, four contract researchers and one editor, with operations in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Edmonton, Sudbury, Kitchener and Truro, N.S. It is a synthesis of three different services, including Canada's first corporate social responsibility research house, a resource centre for consumer and corporate ethics and an ethics consultancy.

EthicScan conducts original and independent research in order to maintain files on 1500 corporations, both Canadian and transnational. These files give access to 300 measures of performance across a broad range of corporate social responsibility and corporate governance topics, said Nitkin.

"If you're an environmental group, you want to make sure that you know something about the production practices of a company. That's largely because if information comes out that indicates the company is a bad actor and you're regarded as taking money from them, that could be a serious concern. It could adversely affect your ability to collect donations and may result in serious problems at the board level.

"The obvious message here is we're not telling people how to think. The data is there and there is a grading and a rating that reflects the values of some 60 experts. But the actual criteria that you choose are your own."

In the area of education, EthicScan offers courses, workshops and bestseller guide books that impart ethics information in a user-friendly format. Individuals assessing who they want to work for, partner with or approach as a source of funding can also refer to the company's extensive library of ethics codes, dilemmas and profiles, said Nitkin.

The consulting side of EthicScan is its largest revenue stream, he said. Associates in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada are responsible for developing codes, training and social or ethics audits, as well as helping companies assess the strength of their governance practices.

Promoting ethics throughout the corporate, management and governmental world varies for each client, he said.

One example of EthicScan's work involves the integrity commission of Trinidad and Tobago, a government agency in which all judges and parliamentarians have to declare their annual income.

"We're working to provide a full range of legal and forensic accounting, ethics, human resources and communications support to the development of the commission," said Nitkin.

While Nitkin will name a few of his company's clients, he said the majority choose to remain unidentified to the public. One such client is a a major Canadian financial institution, for which his team is currently preparing an ethics audit.

Nitkin said ethics should be introduced into businesses for reasons that are green, brown and grey.

Companies such as Mountain Equipment Co-op and the Body Shop, that have reputations as environmentally and socially responsible leaders, fall in the green category, he said.

"But are they really responsible?" Nitkin asked. "They need us to demonstrate that indeed they are the cat's meow."

Companies taking part in illegal or inappropriate activity, or those that are made to look bad (what Nitkin called "the Martha Stewarts"), compose the brown stream. Such businesses "need us to provide necessary and constructive help to enhance their practices," he said.

And then there are the grey companies — those who want to differentiate themselves from the competition. "They're not good or bad, they simply want to distinguish themselves. Ethics gives them that chance."

Nitkin said ethics companies specializing in individual services have surfaced over the years, but EthicScan remains the only one to offer research, education, consultant work and auditing. He said competing companies use his database to obtain information from 300 different records on the social responsibility of a single company. Each report is 20 to 25 pages long and is a review of all aspects of a company's performance.

Bossin family celebrates 100 years in Canada

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More than 225 descendants of Leib Yehuda and Surah Leah Bossin will come together from across North America, Germany and Israel to celebrate the family's 100th anniversary in Canada.

Descendants ranging in age from eight months to 90 years old will gather on the weekend of Aug. 20 at the Nottawasaga Inn in Alliston, Ont., with the youngest offspring representing the family's fifth generation.

The first members of the Bossin clan arrived in Canada a century ago, with Zussman Bozzun (later changed to Bossin) as the leader of the pack.

Born in 1866 to Leib Yehuda and Surah Leah Bossin, Zussman left his roots in Brusilov, Ukraine, which was then part of the Russian Empire, and moved to Canada in 1904. At the time of Zussman's departure, Brusilov was a town of 6,500 people, with Jews making up almost half of its population.

Jews have lived in Brusilov, which is located near Kiev, as far back as 1622. Although they were almost wiped out in the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648 and 1649, the Russian Jews re-established themselves in the town within 75 years.

When Russia went to war with Japan in 1904, further uprisings against the Russian Jews occurred as a response to the population's unrest. This threat, along with a desire to avoid conscription, led the Bossin family to search for refuge in a safer country.

Shortly after Zussman settled in Canada, his brother, Mottel, born in 1875, and Mottel's wife, Malka, followed. Their parents, sisters Chaya Gitel and Dvora Freidel, spouses, children and other family members came as well.

"What a wonderful group we are," says Gloria Wetzler, chair of the reunion. "Think of the many immigrant families who arrived in this great country at that time and have since disappeared from the face of the earth. Not us. We are still together and still a close family."

The Bossin family ties were woven over the last century through friendships, Passover seders, Chanukah parties, picnics and other occasions. A family club was formed in the early 1930s where members met monthly and created a loan group for each other.

To commemorate the family's 100 years in Canada, Allen Bossin has created a 46-page historical booklet to be distributed at the reunion. Dating back to the mid 19th century, it depicts the experiences of the Bossins in the shtetl and portrays Russia under a succession of rulers.

Allen's history reflects the trials, tribulations and successes of the far-reaching branches of his family tree. Credited for initial interviews and research are Bob Bossin, who interviewed the eldest generation of the Bossins in the mid-1970s, and Aubie Bossin, the only surviving son of Mottel, who presented his memories and research at the family's 80th anniversary.

Allen's manuscript tracks the Bossins to the present day and lists family members, their parents, place of residence and connection to the children of Leib Yehuda and Surah Leah Bossin.

Reunion committee member Shayndel Tallan, a grandmother of nine, noted that Leib Yehuda and his son Mottel were founders of the Kiever Synagogue, one of the oldest landmarks in Toronto's Jewish community.

"There are still family members at the Kiever," said Tallan. "Looking back, I realize how lucky we are to have kept so close for such a long time."

Shirley Grossman, a grandmother of four who also sits on the committee, spoke of the closeness between the relatives throughout the year. "There were many children and we had a wonderful and very close-knit family. My children and grandchildren will be at the reunion."

Grossman said the Bossin grandchildren visited their grandparents' house every weekend. "Malka Bossin was a special grandmother who held our family together. And it has continued."

She said the Bossins even have a family website, www.geocities.com/bossincousins, from which they send out news and announcements.

The reunion will include Saturday morning services, a picnic, banquet, golf game and other special events. Bob Bossin of British Columbia, lead musician of his group Stringband, will also headline a performance.

A connection with Israel

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

May 30, 2004, marked the beginning of an emotional and spiritual journey. I embarked on an experience that thousands of other young Jewish adults had experienced before, but I was anxious to see what Taglit/Birthright Israel would specifically provide for me.

Guest Voice

Growing up in Toronto, as a Reform Jew, I have always valued my religion, but I desired a stronger appreciation of my culture and for Israel. I applied for Birthright with this goal in mind – a desire to find a greater connection with Israel.

Since Israel is still so young – it only became a state in 1948 – I felt an obligation to embrace this opportunity and support Israel in its time of need. Despite the concern for safety, I was confident that the Birthright organization would take every precaution in order to guarantee my safety and the safety of the hundreds of young Jews I was about to meet.

Kyle Gordon, right, and fellow Birthright Israel participant Andrea Cohen get a taste of desert life.

My 10-day trip to Israel was exactly what I had always desired, a taste of Jewish history. Walking the streets of the old city in Jerusalem and letting my fingers drag behind me, brushing against the ancient architecture, it was impossible to hold back my tears.

In a land rich with history and beauty, it is hard to believe there is so much anger and hatred. I felt myself engulfed by rage and sadness for a culture forced to live with constant uncertainties.

I asked one man how many children he had. He replied that he had five; he told me he had desired two but knew that there was the possibility that three would be killed.

A million questions rushed through my mind; in a country like Canada war is not inevitable. People do not plan their families around the inevitability of war and the imminent death of some children. The man said to me, "This is reality and this is what we live with every day of our lives."

Should I be sad for him or should I applaud him for his family's courage to fight for Israel, so I could come and experience it? I am thankful to these men and women who risk their lives every day. I was able to visit Israel, and for a brief moment in time, I was welcomed into the homeland of the Jewish people.

Many people have asked me what the highlight of my trip was. After much thought, I would have to say it was the Israelis.

Halfway through my trip, we were joined by eight Israeli soldiers, men and women who shared their stories with us. Although Birthright is designed for participants to feel safe and secure, the soldiers didn't sugarcoat the risks and uncertainty they face every day.

For me, the hardest thing to get used to was seeing them carry their guns the way we carry our knapsacks. Being the same age and having a totally different lifestyle made me more appreciative of the security I have in Canada.

The soldiers' presence was the most valuable gift because, unconsciously, they supplied me with the most relevant and valuable information, their truth. The best way to understand a certain way of life is to immerse yourself in it, open your heart to new adventures and embrace uncertainty. Doing so, for me, means that Israel has captured a special place in my heart.

While I am back in Toronto and unsure of when I will return to Israel, I am confident that the memory of my experiences and the warmth of the bonds that I made will remain with me forever. There is a certain magic that radiates from Israel, and it is only while you are immersed in this magic that you truly feel at home.

Kyle Gordon is majoring in English at the University of Western Ontario.

Torah is framed with love

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The month of Elul immediately precedes the start of the High Holy Days. It is a time of preparation for the complexities that await us as we approach Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The rabbis noticed that the name of the month, "Elul," can be understood as the initials of a well-known Hebrew phrase: "Ani ledodi vedodi li." In Hebrew, the first letters of each word in this phrase are the same as the letters in the name Elul. The phrase means "I am for my beloved and my beloved is for me." It is a quote from the Song of Songs, a dialogue of love, a book in our Bible.

The Song of Songs speaks of intimacies between lovers. Rabbi Akiva added the insight that the book also speaks of the relationship between God and Israel. It is a relationship of love and intimacy and longing. The Talmud states: "You shall make the Lord beloved." The statement does not speak of emotion but rather of action. It does not describe how you must feel but rather how you must act upon those feelings. How you should actively "make" God your beloved.

The Zohar comments: "How does one love the Lord? By encompassing oneself with benevolence on every side, by doing benevolence to all without sparing your strength or your property."

It is clear that the love of God must be actively expressed and not simply felt. We make God our beloved by dealing positively with the world around us. The emotion that we feel for God must translate into actions in the world that God created. It is not enough to feel love, one must show love.

As with all of our behaviour, we try to model ourselves upon God. The rabbis in the midrash tell us that the entire Torah is framed with deeds of chesed, lovingkindness. An act of chesed appears at the beginning of the Torah when God clothes the first man and woman. Similarly, an act of chesed appears at the end of the Torah when God buries Moses. The Torah is thus framed with lovingkindness which becomes the overarching lesson to be read throughout its contents.

In fact, the midrash tells us that the power of acts of lovingkindness can comfort us for the loss of our Temples. Rabbi Joshua was comforted by Rabbi Yochanan after seeing the ruins of Jerusalem. Rabbi Yochanan stated that there is a means of atonement more effective than sacrifice: deeds of lovingkindness.

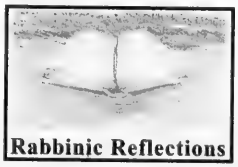
In the Song of Songs, the woman says to her beloved: "I am asleep but my heart is awake." The midrash comments that Israel says to God: "I sleep" in neglect of ritual practice, but "my heart is awake" for the practice of lovingkindness.

We may connect with religious ritual, in varying degrees, with various interpretations and intentions. However, we can always connect with deeds of lovingkindness. We can always extend a greeting and build from there.

The month of Elul invites us to examine how we have made God our beloved. The midrash offers all of us a practical and meaningful solution.

Seeking God's presence

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC



For modern Jews, wrestling with issues of faith is not unusual. Our very name "Israel" means to struggle with God. Many of us seek clarity amidst a confusing world of uncertainty. Woody Allen once said, "If only God would give me a clear sign – like making a large deposit in my name at a Swiss bank."

This week's Torah portion offers a simple yet vital insight for those desiring a closer relationship with God: "… You shall seek out His presence and come there" (Deuteronomy 12:5).

Rabbi Moshe Sofer of Pressburg spun this as an encouragement that if you will seek God's presence, you will attain the nearness you desire.

Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotzk took the idea even further. Based on a similar verse (4:29), "And you shall seek God from there and you shall find Him," the Kotzker asserted that the seeking itself is the finding.

This concept was used by Rabbi Noach Weinberg, founder of Aish HaTorah, to explain a difficult verse in the book of Genesis.

After emerging victorious from a dangerous war against four great kings, God told Abraham not to be afraid and that his reward would be very great (15:1). It's hard to understand why Abraham would be apprehensive after his victory, and where the idea of being rewarded fits into the passage.

Rabbi Weinberg suggested that Abraham's fear was a persistent one that plagued him for years. He was worried that he'd be punished for all the years of his life that he didn't fully believe in God. Although Abraham began to think about God when he was three, he didn't come to full faith until he was 48 years old. God tells Abraham that, on the contrary, for all those years he searched and struggled, he'd be greatly rewarded.

The key factor in the spiritual quest is sincere desire. King David wrote in the book of Psalms, "God is near to all who call upon Him, to all who call upon Him with sincerity" (145:18).

Realizing that our forefathers were paragons of this characteristic can help explain a puzzling comment by the famous commentator Rashi to a verse in the book of Exodus. God declared, "I appeared to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob… " (6:3), and Rashi notes that God appeared to the forefathers.

Since we already know that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are the forefathers, we wonder why Rashi felt the need to inform us of this. Rabbi Moshe Sofer noted that the Hebrew word for forefathers, avot, is related etymologically to the Hebrew word for "desire" or "crave." Rashi, therefore, is providing us with an insight into why the Almighty appeared to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob – because they desired Him. They sought after Him.

The children of Rabbi Baruch of Mezhibuzh, grandson of the Baal Shem Tov, were playing hide-and-seek with friends. One of his children came running home terribly upset and bitterly crying. When Rabbi Baruch asked what happened, the child sobbed and said that when it was his turn to hide, his friends lost interest in the game and didn't bother trying to find him. Rabbi Baruch sighed and said that God, too, is hiding (the Hebrew word for world "olam" means "hidden," because God is not manifest in His world) and that it's sad that many people don't bother trying to find Him.

The great Babylonian sage Rav Saadiah Gaon composed a special personal prayer that he would say each morning. "Oh, God, who is concealed from the eyes of all living things, who is sublime and wonderful beyond the sight of all His creatures, the many heavens cannot contain You. But all those who seek You can find You in their hearts, and all who meditate upon you can find you in their thoughts."

Ultimately, it's up to us. The Kotzker Rebbe said it best. When asked, "Where is God?" he responded by observing that "God is wherever you let Him in."

Israeli hopefuls & the Olympics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we conclude our look at the Olympics with a look at Israel's medalists, a preview of the country's team in Athens and a fascinating – but wild – dream for the future.

This year's delegation from Israel is far different from the one the country sent when it first competed in Helsinki in 1952. Then, the most notable achievement was by Yoav Ra'anan, who took ninth place in springboard diving. Over the next four decades, participating was Israel's main objective. [http://tinyurl.com/6wcfv]

In Barcelona in 1992, Hatikvah was played for the first time when Israeli athletes were presented their medals. Half-middleweight Yael Arad won silver and lightweight Oren Smadga won bronze for judo. At the Atlanta Olympics in 1996, Gal Friedman won bronze in windsurfing. And in Sydney in 2000, Michael Kolganov won bronze for K-1 500-metre single kayak. For more on Israel's Olympic record, check out Ellis Shuman's excellent overview. [http://tinyurl.com/ys27p]

The International Olympic Committee's Olympic website doesn't shed much light on the Israeli team – or the teams from other countries, for that matter. However, its page about Israel's Olympic Committee is worth a visit because of a footnote that reads, "Please visit the official United Nations website for further information regarding the capital of Israel." [http://tinyurl.com/292wl]

You'll learn much more about Israel's team at the Olympic Committee of Israel's official site. There are several pages in English that give an overview of the committee's work and highlights from the Olympics movement in Israel. But the site really excels in Hebrew. There's a summary of how Israel has fared at the Olympics over the years, a list of every athlete who has competed, and this year's hopefuls. There's even a page acknowledging this year's official sponsors of the Israeli Olympic team, including Speedo, Samsung cellphones and Solgar Vitamins. [http://olympic.tapuz.co.il/]

So who are the Israeli stars to keep an eye out for this year? A bit predictably, the president of the Olympic Committee of Israel has proclaimed that "this is the best Olympic team we've ever had." But there does seem to be excitement about the fact that almost half the members of the team are immigrants. They're athletes mostly from the former Soviet Union, but also from Italy, Uruguay and, for the first time, Ethiopia. But the names that seem to be coming up most belong to athletes from the former Soviet Union: pole-vaulter Alex Averbukh, wrestler Gocha Tsitsiashvili and canoeist and kayaker Michael Kolganov. [http://tinyurl.com/2d8x8] If one of them does succeed in bringing home Israel's first gold medal, he or she will pocket a bonus of 500,000 shekals, thanks to the Israeli Olympic Committee and Israel's education ministry. [www.haaretz.com/hasen/spages/448218.html]

As for athletes from this side of the Atlantic, many eyes will be on swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg, who will be back at the Olympics this month. At the Sydney Games in 2000, the American won gold in the 100-metre backstroke, the 200-metre backstroke and the 400-metre medley, setting two Olympic records along the way. Krayzelburg made more fans a year later when he decided to forego the World Championships in Japan in order to attend Israel's Maccabi Games. He told reporters that "being Jewish is part of me; it's part of my culture." [http://tinyurl.com/5r5ha]

For daily progress reports on Israel's Olympic team, check out the Jerusalem Post [http://jpost.com] and the English-language edition of Ha'aretz. [www.haaretzdaily.com]

A few years ago, three architecture students from Tel Aviv University suggested what seemed like then – and now – a preposterous idea: that their city consider hosting the Olympic Games. Their proposal was championed by Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai and was ridiculed by practically everyone else. But an article in Ha'aretz said that although there are many good reasons to write off Israel's chances, there are even better ones to give it a second look. [http://tinyurl.com/3dko3]

"It is easy to respond with cynicism or derision to this ambitious proposal… In the 50 years of its existence, Israel has proved that it is capable of grappling with huge and complex projects in a short time. So it would be advisable to seriously examine the feasibility of holding an Olympiad in Israel." Maybe one day.

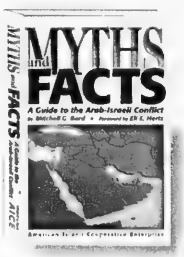
Palestinian claims recognized

MYTH

Anyone who defends settlements is supporting the perpetual occupation of the Palestinian people and their land.

FACT

While making a strong case for its own right to live in the territories, the Israeli government also acknowledges that Palestinians have legitimate claims to the area and feels that a compromise can be reached through negotiations.



Politically, the West Bank and Gaza Strip are best regarded as territory over which there are competing claims that should be resolved in peace process negotiations. Israel has valid claims to title in this territory, based not only on its historic and religious connection to the land and its recognized security needs, but also on the fact that the territory was not under the sovereignty of any state and came under Israeli control in a war of self-defence that was imposed upon the country.

At the same time, Israel recognizes that the Palestinians also entertain legitimate claims to the area. Indeed, the very fact that the parties have agreed to conduct negotiations on settlements indicated that they know a compromise is needed on this issue.

In fact, in the negotiations at Camp David and the White House in 2000, then-prime minister Ehud Barak reportedly offered to dismantle at least 63 settlements. The Palestinians rejected the proposal.

This year, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon proposed a plan under which Israel would disengage from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank. The proposal would have led to the closing of a number of settlements.

At the same time, however, Sharon also made clear that large settlement blocs will remain intact.

An estimated 80 per cent of settlers live in what are, in effect, suburbs of major Israeli cities such as Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Virtually the entire Jewish population believes Israel must retain these areas to ensure its security, and that they could be brought within Israel's borders with minor modifications of the 1967 border.

Sharon singled out four specific settlement blocs that, by consensus, will ultimately be incorporated into Israel: Ariel (population 16,000 in 2001 and now closer to 30,000 when surrounding communities are included), Maale Adumim (25,800 in 2001 and now almost 40,000), Givat Zeev (10,500 in 2001) and the Etzion Bloc (15 communities with an approximate population of 20,000). These four blocs include more than 40 per cent of the total Jewish population of the West Bank.

Sharon has said that clearly, in the permanent agreement, Israel will have to give up some of the Jewish settlements.

But it is inconceivable that Israel would evacuate such large cities, even after a peace agreement with the Palestinians, and at Camp David, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat grudgingly accepted the idea that the large settlement blocs would remain part of Israel.

Ottawa looking into new passport revelations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada's embassies in Israel and New Zealand have joined federal authorities to investigate whether Israelis used a stolen Canadian passport for covert operations abroad, despite an an Israeli pledge seven years ago to stop doing so.

"We're looking into the case," Department of Foreign Affairs spokesperson Reynald Doiron told The CJN last week.

"We don't know where the investigation will lead," he added. "We're trying to get to the bottom of this. We already have some answers."

Doiron said Ottawa is checking into allegations that Zev William Barkan, an Israeli suspected of trying to fraudulently obtain a New Zealand passport, is travelling in Asia on a Canadian passport issued under the name of Kevin William Hunter. The document was reportedly stolen in Guangzhou, China, last spring.

Barkan, who has served in Israeli missions in Belgium and Austria, was seen recently in Pyongyang, North Korea, where he had flown from Beijing using the passport, Canadian Press reported.

He is thought to have fled New Zealand after two other Israelis, Uriel Zoshe Kelman – a 31-year-old dual Canadian and Israeli citizen – and his associate, Eli Cara, 50, were arrested in the case.

Asked what impact the Barkan revelation may have on Canada's relations with Israel, Doiron replied, "It's anyone's guess." He said he does not know when the investigation will be completed.

Since the investigation into the New Zealand case is still in its formative stages, Israel's outgoing ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, has not been asked for an official explanation, Doiron said.

Efforts to reach the Israeli embassy in Ottawa for comment were unsuccessful.

The burgeoning case recalls the 1997 Mashal affair, when two Mossad operatives posing as Canadians and carrying fake Canadian passports tried to kill Khalid Mashal, a top-ranking Hamas official, in Amman, Jordan.

The Israelis were caught by Jordan and released, but only after Hamas' exiled spiritual leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin was allowed to return to his home in the Gaza Strip. Yassin was killed earlier this year by an Israeli missile strike.

In the wake of the Mashal affair, Israel promised Canada it would not use Canadian passports in intelligence operations ever again.

Canada is concerned that the safety of Canadian travellers in the Middle East could be jeopardized if they are suspected of being Israeli spies.

Last month, Kelman and Cara were each sentenced by a New Zealand court to six months in jail, and New Zealand's prime minister, Helen Clark, accused the men of being Mossad spies and imposed diplomatic sanctions on Israel.

Clark said she had "strong reasons" to believe they were Mossad operatives, while her foreign minister, Phil Goff, said he suspected the men tried to obtain the passport for an assassination operation in a third country.

Doiron has said the fact Kelman used a Canadian passport to enter and leave New Zealand would not affect Canada-Israel ties.

Kelman and Cara are appealing their convictions.

It was also reported last month that New Zealand police are looking for Anthony David Reznik, a New Zealander whom they suspect helped Kelman, Cara and Barkan.

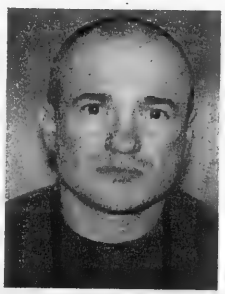
Desalination researcher wins annual BGU Toronto Prize

For the 2004-2005 academic year, the Toronto Prize for Excellence in Research at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev has been awarded to Prof. Boris Zaltzman of the department of solar energy and environmental physics at BGU's Blaustein Institute for Desert Research.

The Toronto Prize for Excellence in Research at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev was established in 1999 by the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University to mark Israel's 50th anniversary and to recognize outstanding achievement for the betterment of humanity by BGU researchers in science and technology, medicine or the humanities.



Professor Boris Zaltzman

Zaltzman is a distinguished scholar whose research explores innovative desalination technologies by using theoretical modelling to study underlying chemical phenomena.

One of his theories has led to an experimental program by the desalination group of the Institute for Water Science and Technology at the Blaustein Institute that could lead to novel desalination techniques and the alleviation of water scarcity problems in Israel and around the world.

"I am working on the fundamentals of membrane desalination processes, such as reverse osmosis and electrodialysis, and am particularly interested in the salt transport in solution layers near the membranes," Zaltzman said.

"I think my approach to research represents a good example of what applied mathematics is all about: modelling a physical phenomenon in a search for its mathematical counterpart, and analyzing the latter in a search for understanding of the physical phenomenon.

"In my future studies I propose to carry on this type of research, to explore in detail the issue of electroconvective instability, in a hope that it will help to improve existing electric water desalination techniques."

For more information on Zaltzman or other research activities at BGU, contact Sheila Krone, executive director of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University's Ontario region, at 416-665-8054 or cdnbgu@on.aibn.com.

Report predicts rise in number of Jewish seniors

The study breaks down the elderly population into three age groupings, with growth projected for each.

There were 28,555 "younger seniors" (65-74 years) in 2001. By 2011, this group is expected to rise "significantly" to nearly 35,000, followed by "a very strong burst" to 56,000 by 2021.

This group represents baby boomers, now aged 45-64. "As this bulge ages, the baby boomers will skew the distribution significantly toward the older [categories] simply by virtue of their sheer numbers," the study states.

The middle grouping, aged 75-84, had 25,360 members in 2001, a number that's expected to shrink to just over 21,000 by 2011, but then rebound to 25,828 by 2021. The study says this age group will then likely increase again as baby boomers replenish it after 2021.

Finally, there were 7,950 "older seniors" (85 years and up) in 2001. Their numbers are expected to rise to 9,757 individuals by 2011. The total is expected to decrease slightly to just over 9,000 people by 2021, although "improved health care and ancillary services may make survival rates for such elders larger than we predict."

"It is clear," the study says emphatically, "that by 2021, the number of Jewish elderly will increase significantly in almost every region of the country."

The most dramatic rise is projected for Ontario, where the Jewish elderly are expected to jump from 31,895 in 2001 to 36,457 in 2011 and 54,535 a decade after that – a startling 70 per cent increase over 20 years.

In Toronto, the Jewish seniors population is expected to climb from 27,495 in 2001, to 30,852 by 2011, to 45,517 by 2021. "This latter increase is staggering," the study says, "and has profound implications for the demographic makeup of the Toronto Jewish community and for the demographic challenges it represents [for] community-based resources and services."

In Quebec, the number of Jewish seniors has been dropping since peaking at nearly 23,000 in 1991. It's predicted to decrease to 18,067 in 2011, but then projected to rebound to 19,251 by 2021.

The number of Jewish seniors in British Columbia is also expected to climb, from 3,790 in 2001 to 11,265 by 2021, with the study again warning of "important implications" for planning in B.C.

Increases in the number of Jewish seniors are also predicted for Alberta and Nova Scotia, with the latter almost tripling in size.

If Jewish seniors are to continue to enjoy a high quality of life well into their elder years, "communities have a responsibility to provide opportunities for physical activity, proper nutrition and social involvement," the study says.

As well, communities must prepare for linguistic and cultural differences within the their own ranks: For example, in Montreal, many Sephardim who immigrated in the 1960s and '70s are reaching their senior years, as are Russian emigres in Toronto and Vancouver who "may be isolated by their lack of English skills and will need special outreach."

Despite the alarming tone sounded by the numbers, there are positive aspects to future scenarios when it comes to the Jewish elderly. For example, the report notes that seniors are becoming more active and informed, "and are increasingly in better positions to decide their futures and to advocate effectively for their own interests."

Among the study's other findings:

- The 61,875 elderly Jews in Canada as of 2001 represent 16.7 percent of the total Jewish population of 370,515.
- There are just over 28,000 elderly Jewish males in Canada, compared to 33,550 females.
- The percentage of Jewish elderly (16.7 percent) is higher than the proportion of seniors in the general population (12.2 percent) but the gap between the two figures has diminished in the last decade.
- Almost half, or 27,495 elderly Jewish Canadians, live in the Greater Toronto Area. The number of Jewish elderly in Montreal is 20,110; in Winnipeg, 3,175; Vancouver, 2,960; Ottawa with 1,575; and Hamilton, 875.
- A total of 12,105 Jewish seniors live below the poverty line, or nearly one-fifth of the elderly Jewish population in Canada. Female seniors are about twice as likely to fall below the poverty line as males.
- Almost half (43.4 percent) of elderly Jewish women in Canada live alone, and of these, almost half are poor. There are 5,705 elderly Jewish widows in Canada who are poor.
- The average income of Jewish seniors in Canada is $24,381, compared to just over $17,000 for the entire senior population. The lowest median income in a city was Calgary, at $21,215.
- Nearly 80 per cent of elderly Jewish men in Canada are married or have a partner, compared to 47.5 percent for elderly women.
- There were 23,660 Holocaust survivors in Canada as of 2001. About one-quarter of them, or 6,145 people, lived below the poverty line. Moreover, 3,395 lived alone and were poor, "representing a particularly vulnerable segment of the elder population."
- Over 10,000 Holocaust survivors had one or more disabilities.
- The report says it is "interesting" that 2,205 Jewish seniors have never married.

Toronto woman killed in diving accident

Aviva Barth, 30, a Toronto woman originally from Guelph, was killed last weekend when she was hit by a boat during diving training on Lake Simcoe.

Barth was diving about 30 metres off a government dock near Innisfil when she was hit by a boat that passed between the end of the dock and the dive marker that lets boaters know divers are swimming beneath them.

She later died from head injuries at Royal Victoria Hospital in Barrie.

Barth is survived by her parents Goldie (Greenspoon) and Saul Barth, sister Jennifer, brother Aaron and grandmother Genya Barth of Israel.

She was co-founder of HavinganAffair.ca, an Internet party planning service.

CBC should expose PA's intimidation of news media

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's column looked at the disparity between the open and often unfavourable news coverage that emanates from Israel and the mostly guarded and uncritical reporting coming from areas under the control of the Palestinian Authority, where journalists face persistent intimidation from officials.

Underscoring this disparity was Nahlah Ayed's CBC Radio report on July 26 about the Israeli Supreme Court's decision to uphold the one-year travel and communication restrictions on Mordechai Vanunu, who was recently released after spending 18 years in prison for revealing details of Israel's nuclear program.

Ayed only presented Vanunu's case: "Vanunu says part of his motivation [in his court challenge] is that he no longer wants to live in a country that put him in jail for 18 years and does not practise what he considers to be democracy."

No one pointed out the irony that Vanunu took his case to the highest court in a country that he believes does not uphold democratic values.

Ayed said that since his release, Vanunu, a convert to Christianity, has "lived in an east Jerusalem church, saying he's more comfortable living among Palestinians and foreigners than in Israel itself." That most Israelis consider eastern Jerusalem to be part of Israel was another point totally omitted from the report.

The same day that Ayed reported on Vanunu's case, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat gave a speech in Arabic from his Ramallah compound. He called for "one million martyrs to march on Jerusalem" – in other words, for continued suicide bombing. The CBC did not report on this speech, although, as noted last week, Matthew Kalman covered it for CTV.

Still, in late July and early August, Ayed reported from the West Bank and Gaza on the factional disputes among the Palestinians. For example, in an Aug. 2 report, she said, "The call for change among Palestinians has grown recently in light of the lack of security and apparent chaos and corruption in the government itself."

Ayed also reported that Mohammed Dahlan, Arafat's former security chief, has threatened large-scale protests in Gaza if Arafat had not implemented reforms by Aug 10.

Said Ayed: "Arafat has promised to make changes, including giving Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia some control over security forces and looking into accusations of corruption within the government… Palestinians hope that unlike earlier promises, the pressure on Arafat this time will bring some real change."

Nonetheless, as of this writing, neither Ayed nor any other CBC correspondent has reported on the subject of widespread intimidation of the media in the territories. By contrast, the BBC's James Reynolds tackled it on Aug. 3.

Reporting about the internecine conflict in Nablus, Reynolds interviewed the local Palestinian radio station manager, Amer Abed-Alahdi, who admitted: "Covering the Palestinian-Palestinian conflict [possibly the first time this term has been heard or seen in the Western news media] does expose us not to blackmail but to violence and retaliation. Beyond the analysis, we cannot really touch the subject, because it is very dangerous."

Reynolds: "Dangerous for you?"

Abed-Alahdi: "Dangerous for us, dangerous for the station, dangerous for the people who work for the station."

But when questioned about criticism of Arafat, Abed-Alahdi gave the safe and standard reply: Arafat is, and always will be, the symbol of Palestinian resistance.

The challenge for the CBC is to expose not only the grave absence of democracy in PA-controlled areas, but also the repressive atmosphere that surrounds and impairs journalists trying to get the full, accurate story out to the world.

This would also provide some balance to Ayed's report about Vanunu and his take on Israeli democracy.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

FAMILY FUN DAY: Stuart Kaufman recently organized a family fun day for the community, in memory of his mother Cecile Kaufman, who died of breast cancer. Here Kaufman and his daughter, Maya, welcome some 200 people who attended the KitchenAid Cook for the Cure Family Fun Day at the Kortright Centre for Conservation. The event raised more than $7,000 for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

Rose Schwartz Park opens in New Waterford

By MATT HUNT GARDNER
Special to The CJN

NEW WATERFORD, N.S. — "This is the Rose Schwartz Park," said Bram Schwartz, pointing with his cane.

The 72-year-old Schwartz was standing on a piece of plywood – to protect the newly laid sod in front of the green and purple band shell built in his mother's name – at the park's opening in mid-July.

Rose Schwartz's great-granddaughters – Ella Rose Feiner, 4, Rose Schwartz Rubinoff, 4, and Rose Lucy Noskwith, 2 – cut the ribbon to officially open the park.

On the site of the former Schwartz family clothing store, the park is one of the clean, grassy areas in downtown New Waterford.

"She would have been really happy today," Bram Schwartz said, between handshakes with those who knew or knew of Rose.

He said that some time ago Carl Getto of the New Waterford and District Economic Renewal Association asked him if he would donate land for a park.

"I said, 'I won't give you a little piece of land – I'll give you it all, all ten lots of it, if you make it a memorial to my mother.'

He added that his mother "never forgot how her family was received and allowed to prosper. She loved this town, and to do something for this town would have been what she wanted."

His mother, born Rose Claener in Russia in 1900, immigrated to Canada with her parents and four siblings in 1913.

Addressing the nearly 300 people who attended the park's opening, Bram Schwartz's daughter, Heidi, said that her grandmother wasn't allowed to attend high school in Russia because she was Jewish, despite scoring top marks on the school's entrance exam.

At age 21, Rose Claener married Abraham Schwartz and they opened the first of several Schwartz family stores in New Waterford.

The Schwartzes soon earned a reputation for being kind-hearted, because they allowed striking or out-of-work miners and their families to buy groceries on credit at their store.

In August 1932, during the Depression, Abraham Schwartz died, leaving his wife pregnant with their sixth child, Bram.

With no business experience, Rose Schwartz took over her husband's clothing store. It prospered, with people coming from all over Nova Scotia to shop there. She worked in the store until she was well into her 90s.

Rose Lacy Noskwith, 2, middle, cuts the ribbon to open the Rose Schwartz Park in New Waterford, N.S. With her are Ella Rose Feiner, 4, left, Rose Schwartz Rubinoff, 4, Heidi Schwartz and Bram Schwartz. The park is on the site of the clothing store Rose Schwartz owned and worked in well into her 90s.

She managed to send all of her children to university and was the first inductee into the Maritime Women's Hall of Fame.

"This is much more emotional than I ever thought it would be," said Rose Schwartz's daughter, Ruth Goldbloom, a speaker at the park's opening.

"She loved the town of New Waterford above any other place. The way she talked about it, you'd think it was a combination of Paris, London and the Rivera."

She said her mother refused to convert her home from coal to oil in the '70s, "because she knew coal was the lifeblood of this community."

Goldbloom gives her mother credit for her own drive and determination. Goldbloom is recognized across Canada as a fundraiser, volunteer and philanthropist and has worked extensively with Halifax's Pier 21 Society. (From 1928 to 1971, almost 70,000 Jewish immigrants are known to have arrived in Halifax at Pier 21. Since 1999, it has been a national historic site.)

Goldbloom's three surviving brothers operated the Schwartz family businesses.

Bram ran the clothing store in New Waterford with his mother, while his older brother Harold took charge of several family clothing stores in Sydney. Irving Schwartz, who has been inducted into the Order of Canada, operated the Schwartz furniture stores and started an organization that trains dogs to find landmines.

"New Waterford welcomed her (Rose Schwartz) when she wasn't welcome in Russia. She never forgot that," said Bram Schwartz. "I know that because of this park, New Waterford, and her family and her great-grandchildren, will never forget her, either."

Likud committee to debate Labor joining gov't

By MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Likud party's internal court accepted an appeal on Monday filed by Minister Uzi Landau and 11 other Likud MKs calling for a convening of the Likud committee on Aug. 18 to discuss the Labor Party joining the government.

The Likud court's acceptance of the appeal means that, until the committee makes a ruling during its meeting, the Labor Party cannot join the coalition.

According to many observers, most Likud committee members oppose Labor joining the coalition. Senior Likud sources said colleagues of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had been working to reject the appeal filed by Landau.

Meanwhile, Labor party members attacked chairman Shimon Peres on Monday, saying he did not hold firm on the party's position during a Sunday meeting with Sharon over the possibility of Labor joining the government.

During the meeting, Sharon rejected Labor's demand to delay voting on the 2005 budget, but Peres nevertheless decided to continue talks. Labor wants to propose changes to the new budget.

Labor MK Ophir Pines-Paz said: "I don't understand why negotiations are continuing after Sharon refused to delay the vote on the budget. None of our demands have been met." Pines-Paz called on Labor bodies to meet this week to discuss this issue.

Labor MK Ephraim Sneh also demanded that the party meet to hear a report on the progress of coalition talks from Labor's negotiation team.

Peres wants concessions on economic, social policy

Labor and Likud renewed talks on forming a unity government Monday in Kfar Maccabiah in Ramat Gan, despite the lack of progress in Sunday's meeting between Peres and Sharon.

The two leaders failed to end the crisis in the coalition negotiations, as Sharon backed his negotiating team's refusal to delay a cabinet vote on the 2005 budget until the parties reach an agreement on economic issues.

Peres told Sharon that while Labor's main reason for entering the government is the Gaza disengagement plan, it can't join without some concessions on economic and social issues, particularly given his party's harsh reaction to the budget proposals presented to the cabinet Sunday.

Earlier Sunday, Peres confirmed media reports that negotiators from Labor and Likud have reached agreement on terms of the Gaza pullback and general policy toward the Palestinians.

Peres said his main demands were adopted, including introducing a more detailed timetable for a withdrawal.

He added that Sharon was also willing to consider co-ordination with the Palestinians. "They [Sharon's negotiators] agreed to see if they can find an effective Palestinian partner," Peres told the Italian newspaper Il Secolo.

MK Amram Mitzna, the former Labor leader, said his party shouldn't demand any ministerial portfolios if it joins the coalition. Labor must emphasize that if it joins the coalition, it will be to push forward the disengagement process, Mitzna told Israel Radio.

Sources in Sharon's office said the prime minister's first preference is for a coalition consisting of Likud, Labor, the Shinui party and the United Torah Judaism party.

Shinui MK Eliezer Sandberg on Sunday dismissed the possibility that his party would sit in a coalition with Shas, telling Israel Radio the haredi party is definitely "not on our menu."

Greek Jews heirs to a long tradition

Olympic Games set to start this week

By the mid-16th century, Salonika – once known as the "Jerusalem of the Balkans" – had become a Jewish center of Europe, as persecuted Jews poured in.

In 1900, there were approximately 80,000 Jews in Salonika out of a population of 173,000.

In the early 20th century, the city was under Turkish rule, and after the Turkish sultan was overthrown by republicans known as the "Young Turks," Jews in the city entered a "golden era," during which they could be found in most professions. They were traders, tobacco and port workers, lawyers, physicians and teachers.

The first Zionist organizations in Greece – Agudat Bnei Zion and Maccabee – appeared in Thessaloniki. By the eve of World War II, there were more than 20 Zionist organizations in the city.

But at the same time, increasing competition in the job market during the first decades of the 20th century, particularly among craftsmen and tradespeople, motivated thousands of Jews to emigrate, mostly to the United States.

The war was a disaster for the community. The Nazi army occupied the city on April 9, 1941. In early 1943, all of the city's Jews were herded into ghettos; later that year they were deported.

All told, 43,850 Jews, 95 per cent of the Salonikan Jewish population, were deported from Salonika. Out of 77,377 Jews in Greece, only 10,000 survived the Holocaust.

Today, there are nine active Jewish communities in Greece: Athens; Thessaloniki, or Salonika; Larissa; Chalkis; Volos; Corfu; Trikala; Ioannina; and Rhodes.

In Athens, Thessaloniki and Larissa, synagogues hold services regularly – and in Athens and Salonika there are Jewish schools.

The umbrella organization of Greek Jewry is the Central Board of Jewish Communities, known by its Greek abbreviation, "KIS."

Other Jewish organizations include the Women's International Zionist Organization, the Bat-El Union of Zionists for young women and the Union of Second Generation of Holocaust Survivors.

The Jewish Museum of Greece, founded in Athens in 1977, preserves the heritage of the community.

As it is elsewhere in the world, intermarriage is common among Greek Jews, who are generally assimilated and well-off, and work in business or in white-collar professions.

Many observers say that anti-Semitism in Greece today is on the rise. Most instances of anti-Semitism have appeared in fringe papers and electronic media of the extreme right.

One or two mainstream papers, such as Elefterotypia and Ta Nea, do occasionally carry anti-Semitic cartoons, mainly when they are criticizing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon or Israeli policies.

International Jewish groups have been quick to criticize the Greek government for not reacting to increased anti-Semitism, and the Simon Wiesenthal Center issued a travel advisory urging Jewish travelers to avoid visiting Greece for the upcoming Olympic Games, which get under way on Aug. 13.

Perhaps in reaction to the criticism, Greece recently announced that it would establish a national day of remembrance for Greek Jews who died in the Holocaust.

Greece's Interior Ministry said it will submit legislation to Parliament that would make Jan. 27 – the day prisoners were liberated from Auschwitz – a "Day of Remembrance of Greek Jewish Holocaust Victims."

Border crossing reopens

Some 1,500 Palestinians crossed from Egypt into Gaza after Israel ended a three-week shutdown of the Rafah border crossing meant to uncover tunnels being used for arms smuggling. The United States pressured Israel to open the border after reports of privations suffered by up to 4,500 Palestinians stranded on the Egyptian side. The army didn't say if it uncovered any tunnels. The Palestinian Authority and Egypt declined an Israeli offer to allow Palestinians to cross elsewhere during the search, saying an additional crossing would require reworking delicate agreements.

Temple model moving

The model of the Second Temple that has stood on the grounds of Jerusalem's Holyland Hotel for more than 40 years is being moved to the Israel Museum to make way for an apartment complex. The hotel's owners will pay for the move and will continue to receive admission revenues at the model's new site near the Shrine of the Book.

Druze to head Border Police

A Druze man was named chief of Israel's paramilitary Border Police last week. Hussein Fares is the first Druze to head the border police. The Druze, a secretive Islamic sect, are seen as Israel's most loyal religious minority. Another Druze heads Israel's Home Front Command. Fares replaces David Tsur, who left to become Tel Aviv's police chief.

Crusader-era find in Jaffa

Crusader-era graves were found in Jaffa last week. The four adult male skeletons unearthed outside the walls of Jaffa's Old City were the latest evidence linking the port city to European shipping traffic in the Byzantine and medieval eras, archeologists said. The remains are believed to be of ordinary people, due to the lack of jewelry or ritual items nearby – a factor that makes their ethnicity unclear .

Galilee Arab arrested

An Israeli Arab student was linked to a Hamas plot to bomb a Jerusalem café. Zahar Ali, a Galilee Arab pursuing a master's degree at Hebrew University, was arrested last month for aiding a Hamas terror cell in Hebron, the Shin Bet said last week. He is accused of helping to plot a triple suicide bombing that was foiled after Shin Bet received intelligence and posted extra security in the area. He is also believed to have done reconnaissance of a major defence firm and sites frequented by Israeli troops in the Galilee.

EU fraud squad eyes Arafat

The European Union wants to interrogate Palestinian terrorists about funding abuses by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. The EU fraud squad, which is probing the extent to which the PA has funnelled European aid money into terrorism, recently asked Israel for permission to question imprisoned members of Arafat's Fatah movement. Israel is expected to grant it.

Ten Canadians among latest batch of olim

Arrive on special El Al flight chartered by Nefesh B'Nefesh

By JENNY HAZAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Ever since she can remember, 18-year-old Michal Faust from Montreal has wanted to live in Israel.

"Israel is our homeland," said the recent Hebrew Academy graduate. "I think every Jew should be in Israel."

But it wasn't until Nefesh B'Nefesh came along that moving to Israel became a viable option for Faust.

"Without Nefesh B'Nefesh, I don't know if I would have been able to officially make aliyah right now," said Faust, one of 10 Canadians among a group of 250 new immigrants from North America who arrived in Israel last Wednesday on a special El Al flight chartered by Nefesh B'Nefesh. "They made everything so much easier."

Faust was on the second of three special flights – being organized co-operatively by the Jewish Agency for Israel and Nefesh B'Nefesh – that will bring 1,500 North American Jews to Israel by the end of the summer, including 80 Canadians hailing from Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and British Columbia.

The first flight of 500 Jews arrived last month and the third one is expected this week.

Since bringing its first flight to Israel in July 2002, the nonprofit agency has flown more than 3,000 new immigrants to Israel from North America.

Founded by an American, Rabbi Yehoshua Fass, in 2001, Nefesh B'Nefesh's mission "is to revitalize North American aliyah and to expand it for generations to come by removing the financial, professional and logistical obstacles that prevent many would-be olim from fulfilling their dream."

According to Charley Levine, a spokesperson for Nefesh B'Nefesh in Israel, the organization not only provides up to $25,000 (US) per family – and $8,000 to $10,000 for single people – to help new immigrants adjust to their new lives in Israel, it also helps them avoid the bureaucratic hassles of making aliyah by bringing Israeli government representatives onto flights and assisting new olim in finding housing, education and employment.

"The unemployment rate among our olim is better than the national average," boasts Levine, who said 93 per cent of those who have made aliyah with Nefesh B'Nefesh have found jobs in Israel through the organization's employment outreach program.

Although 28-year-old Rabbi Ari Enkin from Winnipeg is still looking for work after making aliyah with his wife and two small children on Nefesh B'Nefesh's July 14 flight, he said the organization has been a big help.

"Nefesh B'Nefesh has assisted us in so many different ways," Rabbi Enkin said. "They really give olim a boost through the most difficult times."

So far, Rabbi Enkin said, the highlight of his aliyah experience has been his arrival at Ben Gurion International Airport, where Prime Minister Ariel Sharon greeted the new immigrants.

"It was very special for us to be greeted by the democratically elected leader of the Jewish state," recalls Enkin. "Sharon is keeping his word about the importance to him of aliyah from North America."

Faust was also thrilled at the reception her group of olim received last week, when Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Minister of Education, Culture and Sport Limor Livnat and Labor MK Colette Avital showed up to greet the new arrivals.

"It sent us all a clear message that we are appreciated and that we are being recognized for coming," said Faust, who will begin Sherut Leumi, Israel's alternative national service program for religiously observant girls, at the end of August.

"Their presence at the welcoming ceremony should encourage more people from North America to immigrate to Israel."

Levine explained why North American aliyah is so important.

"From the point of view of the North American Jews, it's a question of realizing one's destiny. Every Jewish individual needs to explore the very important question of where they stand when it comes to Israel," he said.

"From Israel's point of view, North American Jews represent a very high quality of aliyah. We want Jews from everywhere. But North Americans are a fairly problem-free contingent for absorption into the State of Israel."

Rabbi Enkin said making aliyah is the best way for North American Jews to help Israel.

"Every time I would see a terror attack in Israel on the news I would say, 'I want to do something to help.' But, no matter how many cheques you sign and no matter how many letters you write to your politicians, the best thing remains coming here and being here. That's the reason why I made aliyah.

"I believe that Jews who remain in the Diaspora are spectators to Jewish history. Jews who live in Israel make Jewish history and a Jew who wants to be part of Jewish history and Jewish destiny has to live here," he said. "Israel provides the best environment for every Jewish family to grow and there is a lot of room here for every Jew in Canada to come along."

Rabbi Fass, Nefesh B'Nefesh's founder said the group is "firmly on course to bringing 100,000 North American Jews to live here," ideally over the the next five to 10 years.

In the meantime, Levine said the organization's immediate goal is to make every single Jew in Canada and the United States consider aliyah as an option. "There are millions of North American Jews who have never thought about it as an option, and we want to challenge them to think about it."

U.K. Jews want rules against anti-Semitic content on Al-Jazeera

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The British Board of Deputies, the umbrella group for U.K. Jewry, wrote to Britain's Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, Tessa Jowell, last week to express concern over offensive content on the Arabic Al-Jazeera satellite news channel, which is available on cable in the United Kingdom.

The board requested that stringent rules be imposed to ensure that anti-Semitic or other abusive comments are not broadcast in Britain.

Al-Jazeera broadcasts material from the Arab world, some of which has been overtly anti-Semitic and has been accused of inciting hatred against Jews.

In a ruling last month, the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission allowed cable companies to carry Al-Jazeera, providing they monitor and edit its programs for offensive content.

Neville Nagler, the Board or Deputies' director general, commented: "We are not requesting that Al-Jazeera should be banned in this country. But we are greatly concerned at the potential for importing into the U.K. the language of incitement and hatred against Jews, which is so prevalent in the Arab media."

German slave labour fund makes final payments to survivors

By URIEL HEILMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Gisela Schlanger had tears running down her face as she described her plans for the payment she was to receive this week from Germany for her Holocaust-era slave labour.

"My aim after the Holocaust was to raise my children frum-Yiddish," she said, explaining that she strived to bring up a religious family committed to Jewish tradition.

"My children are talmidei chachamim" – Torah scholars, she said. "I have a very special grandson, a tzaddik. The money I get, I give him to buy sforim," or books of Judaica.

Each book will carry a memorial inscription for family members murdered by the Nazis, Schlanger said.

Schlanger spoke Aug. 2 at a Claims Conference news conference in New York called to announce new payments to Jewish slave labourers.

A survivor from Slovakia, Schlanger was one of 130,681 survivors from 62 countries who were sent payments of about $3,000 (all figures US) last week by the Claims Conference. The payout, totalling some $401 million, represented the second and final installment of payments from a $1.1-billion slave labour agreement with Germany.

It was the largest-ever single Holocaust payout in history, according to officials at the Claims Conference, which administers the Jewish portion of compensation payments from Germany to Nazi-era slave labourers.

The money comes from a $5-billion fund paid for by the German government and 6,000 German businesses, only some of which benefited from Jewish slave labour. Most recipients are non-Jews.

"The payment carries a value that cannot be measured in dollars," said Aron Krell, 76, a Polish-born survivor.

"This money can never compensate me for the loss of my family, my childhood or even for all the work that I performed. No amount ever could," he said. "But I do feel some satisfaction from receiving payment, however symbolic, as a recognition by the German government and companies of the terrible wrongs they inflicted on us. We have waited a very long time for this acknowledgment, this apology."

As a volunteer for the Claims Conference, Krell has worked the phones helping Polish- and Yiddish-speaking survivors understand what they need to do to get their claims processed and assuaging their anxieties about when they will get paid.

Combined with the first payment, which was made as soon as a claim of having been a forced labourer was verified and processed, ex-slave labourers have received a total of about $7,500 each.

The Claims Conference's news conference brought to a close one of the conference's central tasks: finding survivors and verifying their accounts of forced labour by the Nazis.

Since the agreement to establish the slave labour fund was signed in 2000, researchers have been combing through more than 150 archives in 30 countries, looking for data to verify survivors' claims.

With the final payout made from the fund, the job is over for many of the 200 or so historians, data processors, technology experts and claims processors who worked at the Claims Conference in New York collecting data, processing claims and administering payments. Conference officials said that even as the organization is letting many employees go, it is hiring legal and financial experts for the group's next big task: finding the rightful owners and heirs of Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts.

Palestinian police to receive guns

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The rallying cry of Israeli opponents to the Oslo accords – "Don't give the Palestinians guns!" – is being sounded again, this time against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Responding to a request by the Palestinian Authority (PA), which hopes to put down a revolt by reformist vigilantes in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the Sharon government last week agreed in principle to allow Palestinian police to have armed patrols.

Sharon said Sunday that the decision was subject to cabinet approval, but few among Israel's top brass expected a veto.

"Had the Israel Defence Forces not met the Palestinian demand, we ourselves would be blamed for the anarchy in the [Palestinian] Authority," Israel's chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, told reporters Sunday.

According to security sources, Palestinian police who have been cleared of any connection to terrorism would be allowed to carry pistols and batons in specified areas of the West Bank and Gaza.

Palestinian officials said preliminary deployment of armed police could begin this week in Ramallah, Tulkarm and Jericho.

Israeli security sources said the Palestinian patrols would co-ordinate all movements with Jerusalem to prevent their coming under fire should Israeli forces need to launch a sweep for terrorists.

The Defence Ministry decision was criticized by right wingers who recalled the creation, under the 1993 Oslo accord, of armed Palestinian security forces. Many of the armed officers later turned their guns on Israeli soldiers and settlers. The decision to encourage self-policing by the Palestinian Authority flowed from a declaration by Israel's military intelligence chief, Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi-Farkash, last week that terror in the West Bank and Gaza was a "bottomless barrel." Ze'evi-Farkash's comments were intended to push home his belief that Palestinian terrorism cannot completely be quashed by Israel's military.

Ya'alon said the decision was "reversible" should it be abused by the Palestinians, but security sources admitted that the prospect of mounting military raids into the West Bank and Gaza to disarm the police would be tactically and politically rash.

Anthology of Canadian Jewish writing published in Nebraska

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"To be a Jew and a Canadian is to emerge from the ghetto twice."

When Mordecai Richler made that insightful observation in 1971, Canada was still a literary backwater and postwar Canlit was just beginning to explode onto the international scene.

Today, as Michael Greenstein demonstrates in a newly published anthology of Canadian Jewish writing, even our Jewish writers are no longer confined to a parochial ghetto. Many, including the late Richler, are fully part of mainstream culture.

We are blessed with a cornucopia of significant Jewish Canadian writers

A Toronto-based littérateur who is an adjunct professor of Jewish studies at McGill University, Greenstein is the editor of Contemporary Jewish Writing in Canada: An Anthology, a book that was recently published in hardcover by the University of Nebraska Press.

Through a lively cross-section of 17 stories and novel excerpts, the anthology reminds us that we are blessed with a cornucopia of thoughtful, engaging and significant Jewish Canadian writers, the best of whom break all parochial bonds that tie them to the proverbial ghetto.

In a relatively modest number of pages (232), the book manages to highlight our humble Yiddish beginnings, focus on our three main regional centres of Jewish literary production (Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto), explore our national French-English dichotomy and emphasize the wide diversity of Jewish writers presently writing in Canada.

Countless American undergrads who find this book on their course lists, especially those who have never encountered Leonard Cohen or Mordecai Richler, are in for a special treat. The book opens with excerpts from The Favourite Game, Cohen's unique 1963 novel, and continues with a segment of Barney's Version from Richler's mature period.

No previous anthology of this kind has included selections translated from French

It also offers excerpts from the relatively recent mainstream novels Fugitive Pieces by Anne Michaels, which became a celebrated international best-seller, and Martin Sloane by Michael Redhill, which established his literary reputation in Canada.

These works, which are partly set in Greece and Ireland respectively, underline a central theme of Greenstein's symphonic introduction – that Canadian Jewish writers transcend local geography to "find mythologies outside of national boundaries."

The anthology is spiced with the Yiddish flavouring of Mrs. Maza's Salon, Miriam Waddington's memoir of her childhood rendezvous with one of Montreal's leading Yiddish literary lights. Chava Rosenfarb's story, A Friday in the Life of Sarah Zonabend, offers another Yiddish "tam."

To my knowledge, no previous anthology of this kind has included selections translated from French, but here we're offered significant items by Monique Bosco, Naim Kattan and Regine Robin. The book also weighs in with excerpts from two novels by Robert Majzels, an essay by David Solway about Irving Layton, and short stories by Robyn Sarah, Judith Kalman, Norman Levine, Matt Cohen, Gabriella Goliger and Aryeh Lev Stollman.

Can such a book get to press without a selection by A.M. Klein? Greenstein thinks so; he more than compensates by paying due homage to Klein and other excluded worthies in his erudite opening essay.

By putting such a pre-eminent focus on what he calls "the drift of new voices" (even including a section from a Majzels novel not yet in print), Greenstein makes an important point. For all the riches of the Canadian-Jewish literary past, this is a genre that seems to be exploding into a new and multifaceted glory, just as Canlit did a few decades back.

Singer/songwriter to get national radio play

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Mark Feldman is making good use of his business degree – but not in the way you'd expect.

Feldman, 24, is taking everything he learned at the University of Western Ontario and applying it to marketing himself as a singer/songwriter.

"It's no different than what I learned in school," the Thornhill, Ont., resident says. He explains that a company might get 100 resumes for a job. Some are removed from the pile for spelling mistakes, others for their appearance, others for not meeting the criteria.

"In the end, this leaves them with maybe 10 per cent that they actually start looking at."

Feldman uses this approach to attract the attention of important people in the music business, distributing his own CD and snappy press kit.

"Image is a big thing and then following up is a huge part of it," he says.

I agree. He called me several times after he handed me his self-produced, self-titled CD before I agreed to interview him for this story.

And of course if self-confidence is a big marketing tool, Feldman has lots of that.

"I think I'm a very talented writer," he says. "Recognition on a global scale is my ultimate goal. I know it's hard to make it happen with one CD. I'd like to headline a major concert and be recognized – that is the plan."

A successful marketing approach requires a sound business plan and Feldman has one prepared.

"I started off by talking to the media, and then I sent around 20 CDs to record labels to get some professional feedback.

"I'm sending off some of my songs to music publishers to see if they'll pick up a couple of songs [and sell to other artists] and then finally I'll send CDs to radio stations."

Feldman's business approach is paying off. One person at CBC Records loved the CD and asked for more CDs, so he can distribute them to CBC radio stations nationally for radio play. "They should be playing my songs nationally in a month or so. That's very important."

Feldman's music is simple folk/pop, played mostly on an acoustic guitar. His press sheet says it's a mixture of Bob Dylan, John Mayer (a 25-year-old Grammy Award-winning singer/songwriter) and "a twist of James Taylor."

Truthfully, it is some of that but a whole lot more. I found myself humming the melody to the first song, Bonita Bay, after just one listen.

"Developing your own style is essential and being unique sets my music apart," Feldman says. "There are many bands out there that sound the same, but the few that sound different is what makes them special."

Although he plays all the instruments on this CD and plays solo gigs, he would like to form a band and have a fuller sound. But he only wants to work with professional studio musicians who can listen to his songs once and add their creative touch to them. "Musical sophistication is absolutely key," he says.

Feldman enjoys listening to groups such as the Beatles, The Band, Phish and Jack Johnson. Mostly, though, he's got a soft spot for perennial folk crooner Dylan.

"My dad started playing Bob Dylan songs like Like a Rolling Stone when I was young; something just clicked and that was it for me."

The longest song on Feldman's CD is a tribute to his icon, Dylan, called Talkin' Bob Dylan Blues. The song is structured like a classic Dylan story-within-a-song, on acoustic guitar and harmonica, and filled with Dylan references. The song tells of a dream that the narrator has about meeting a young Dylan and getting advice from him as they "drank and laughed into the night, playing tunes and loving life."

Mark Feldman

"I dreamt of Bob Dylan five or six times, very vivid dreams," he admits. The night before he wrote the song, he dreamed he met a young Dylan, "but everything else is all a figment of my imagination."

Feldman is convinced that his hard work and perseverance will pay off. "The key is to keep writing good music – it's all about writing good music. Talent can only go undetected for so long. I have a lifetime of incredible songs in me."

Feldman recently auditioned for Canadian Idol, and although he didn't make the final cut, he gained a lot from that experience.

"I gave my CD to Jake Gold (one of the judges and former manager of the Tragically Hip) who really liked it. I met some good people who've come out and seen me play. Something like that always pays off either intrinsically or career wise."

Feldman gigs three to four times a week, playing some of his own songs and a selection of favourite crowd pleasers. He's performing every Sunday until Labour Day at Rocky Mountain High (125 York Blvd, Richmond Hill), from 5:30-9p.m.!

He also does private and corporate functions. For more information, visit his website, www.markfeldman.ca, or e-mail markfeldman@rogers.com.

Rosh Hashanah and Continuity...

This time of year in the Jewish calendar is all about beginnings and recommitments. Thankfully, once again, we are given the opportunity to begin anew and to recommit to the people, the values and the way of life that are most precious to us. If staying connected to the Jewish community in Canada and abroad is part of that new beginning for you , there is no better vehicle for doing so than The Canadian Jewish News.

As a way of helping individuals launch their new beginnings, The CJN is introducing a special continuity subscription offer in time for Rosh Hashanah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $19.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication.

Could there be a better gift at Rosh Hashanah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

The editor.

For the sake of the children

The cloudless, deep blue sky behind them belies the storm of terror that has broken upon the land these past three years. Alas, there appears no imminent sign on the horizon that the storm will abate.

Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky recently told a Toronto audience about a new, terror-induced phenomenon that has taken hold in Jerusalem.

Members of families leave notes of love whenever they leave the house. However mundane and routine the reason for the departure – a child going to school, a parent to work or a sibling merely going shopping – a note of love and of possible farewell is left behind, usually on the kitchen table, so that no words might be left unsaid in the cruel event that the child or the parent does not return home.

We therefore greet the coming year as we did last the one: with hope in our hearts and a prayer on our lips that this year will bring the people of Israel closer to peace.

Rosh Hashanah is the holiday of judgment. We are sustained by the traditional belief that one of the key underpinnings of our world is justice, even though it is not always apparent to our merely human sensibility and understanding.

But where is the justice, we cry out, when suicide bombers wantonly and deliberately slaughter children returning from an outing at the Kotel?

Where is the justice, we cry out, when the United Nations General Assembly protects the chief planner and practitioner of terrorism?

Where is the justice, we cry out, over and over again?

Beckett's play about nothing not as boring as it sounds

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

As Seinfeld fans can attest, a show about nothing can be as amusing as a show about something. Waiting for Godot, Soulpepper's first play of the season returning to the Premiere Dance Theatre is truly an absurdist creation by French playwright Samuel Beckett.

Nothing happens, as in no real plot emerges, but the challenging script and the exemplary performance by the two leads prove that watching people waiting isn't as boring as it sounds.

Vladimir (William Hutt) and Estragon (Jordan Pettle) are two tramps killing time as they wait for the mysterious Godot. Set on a country road sparsely adorned with a bare tree, the two-act play establishes the kinship forged by these two friends, whose bond is cemented by more than patience; the older wanderer Vladimir believes there is salvation in Godot's arrival while Estragon's main problems centre on hunger, uncomfortable boots and a bad memory.

Often, Estragon urges Vladimir to leave, but the resolute old man simply replies, "We can't go. We're waiting for Godot."

But the audience doesn't have to wait long for mesmerizing performances. Hutt displays his incredible range as he fearlessly steps into the raggedy shoes of Vladimir. A simple goofy smile, or a woe-is-me frown, sparks a torrent of emotion from a character that only few actors could tackle.

Hutt's diction is perfect, and he delivers Beckett's ping-pong dialogue with the energy of an actor half his age. Indeed, Hutt's grizzled look contrasts wonderfully with his acting partner's wide-eyed innocence.

Jordan Pettle proved his mettle in Zaide's Shoes, Written on Water and Sunday Father, and in Waiting for Godot he also adds some sparkle to the role of an inquisitive, despondent and suicidal tramp.

Estragon's comedic flares require smooth transitions and Pettle delivers the laughs without any bumpy segues. Pettle and Hutt lay down their lines with exceptional timing, as the circular conversations often end with an impatient wave of the hand and a "Forget it."

There is something electric between the two leads, as if these two actors have teamed up for years. Their friendly embraces are tender and thoughtful, and their angry insults resemble any relationship that has turned ugly for only several minutes. Director Albert Schultz knew when to leave physical space between Hutt and Pettle, but he also understood the need for tension that spanned several paces.

Although the play focuses on the two tramps, Beckett also included an odd supporting cast that today would be called "those wacky neighbours." Pozzo (Joseph Ziegler) is the pompous slave-owner of a baggage-lugging Lucky (Oliver Dennis), and Schultz doesn't mask the cruelty.

Pozzo drags Lucky with a rope, often choking the quiet slave with a sharp tug. Dennis, as Lucky, plays the role with tired wheezes and groans, and his gibberish monologues – with lines such as "In spite of the tennis, the facts are still there" – offer a mind-tickling break from the pitter-patter conversations.

Ziegler is the only weak spot in the play, as his overacting and arching eyebrows don't offer the realism his role deserves. Trying to steal scenes from Hutt or Pettle is not a wise move.

Waiting for Godot is beyond a glimpse into wiling away the hours. Interpretations abound on Beckett's experimental work: a Marxist parallel exists between Pozzo, the capitalist, and Lucky, the labourer; Godot is God, and the two tramps act as humanity waiting for a saviour (although Beckett once remarked that Godot came from the French word "godillot," meaning a military boot); since Vladimir and Estragon devise games while waiting, those distractions can also be seen as our toil through tedium partaking in any number of diversions (TV, sports) that avoid heavy questions such as "Why are we here?"

After two-and-a-half hours, more lateral thinkers may wonder why they paid to hear meandering talk amidst slapstick comedy. But whoever is looking for challenging work staged by a skilled theatre company should look no further – Waiting for Godot is about nothing and something, if that makes sense. Beckett would've understood.

Waiting for Godot runs from Aug. 27 to Sept. 24, at Premiere Dance Theatre (207 Queen Quay West). For ticket info, call the Soulpepper box office 416-973-4000.

89-year-old artist still growing

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Art is a growing thing – you grow with it," says artist and teacher Anne Greenstein.

Greenstein turns 90 years old this October and has the enthusiasm and vitality of someone half her age.

A recognized artist and humanitarian from Montreal, she moved to Toronto a year and half ago.

Her solo art exhibition, Jazz Series Collages, is on at the North York Central Library, 5120 Yonge St., until August 31.

Greenstein said that after her husband died 13 years ago, she spent three months creating a dramatic form of collage using black pigment. From that period of experimentation, the vivid images in her current show evolved.

"Collage gave me the opportunity to make art more abstract," she says. "I had to fool myself into it."

Born Anne Greenberg in Warsaw, Poland, in 1914, she came to Canada with her family in 1930. As a child, her drawings were included in an exhibit of children's art that toured Poland.

She studied at the École Des Beaux-Arts in Paris and the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts.

During an interview in her studio, she recalled that her father told her, "Anne, when you marry, you don't know who you will be married to, and your husband may not make a living, so you have to be independent."

He sent her to apprentice at a photo studio, where she later worked as a retoucher.

She married businessman Sam Greenstein, and as a young mother, she taught art to preschoolers. She went on to become the director of the Fine Arts Department of the Golden Age Association in Montreal (now the Cummings Jewish Centre), where she worked with seniors for more than 50 years.

Greenstein retired after she had heart surgery. At her retirement party, she received a tribute presented by Reva Gesser, who served as the association's president from 1964 to '66.

The plaque she received says that she "shared her gifts of artistic talent, boundless energy, eternal optimism and an abiding belief in the innate creativity of every human being.

"Anne teaches us all with her warmth, compassion and love, and we are all enriched for knowing her."

Greenstein was also the director of the Laurentian Fresh Air Camp for Seniors for 13 years.

In Montreal, she exhibited widely, with six solo exhibitions as well as group and travelling shows.

Over the years, Greenstein has embraced new artistic media. A showing of her mixed media – oils, acrylics and collages – is on at the Fairview District Library, 35 Fairview Mall Dr., this October.

Currently, she is a volunteer in the art department at the Don Mills Foundation for Seniors, Taylor Centre.

"All my life, I believed people had something inside begging to come out," she says. She adds that her priority in teaching is "to ignite a spark in my students."

Greenstein has two children, David, a psychologist in Waterloo, and Elaine Minsky, an early childhood educator; five grandchildren, Daniel and Camille Greenstein, and Adam, Katie and Emma Minsky; and one great-grandchild.

Reiter crowned Montreal's first 'Jewish Idol'

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — A crowd of about 1,000 packed the Spectrum in downtown Montreal last month to see teenager Kathleen Reiter eliminate nine other finalists in the city's first Jewish Idol competition.

Reiter, 15, a Herzliah High School (Snowdon) student, captured the crown June 27 with her rendition of Aretha Franklin's Respect. She also sang The Voice Within, made famous by Christina Aguilera, in the preliminary round.

Jewish Idol, organized by Centre Hillel, copied the format of the popular American Idol television show, which features aspiring young pop singers competing in an elimination tournament decided by a combination of audience votes and judges' opinions.

"I knew I was going to win," Reiter declared before she performed I Will Always Love You, the Dolly Parton tune that was also a Whitney Houston hit, as her victory song.

During two auditions in May leading up to the final night, close to 100 entrants were winnowed down to the 10 semi-finalists who performed at the Spectrum.

The show was structured just like the TV version, although at more than 3½ hours, it was much longer than a single episode on the small screen. Hosted by MusiquePlus VJ Chéli Sauvé-Castonguay, the evening featured a panel of four judges from the music industry – rap singer Anson Oliver, record producers David Kakon and Jean Lamothe, and performer François Babin – who each made brief comments after each performance.

From the beginning, it was evident that each performer had a contingent of family, friends and fans in the crowd. Every singer, whether they were emulating Céline Dion, Lionel Ritchie, Aretha Franklin or Frank Sinatra, drew sustained applause.

For the most part, the judges acted more as cheerleaders than critics, though Oliver was booed by the audience when he occasionally adopted the persona of Simon Cowell, the notoriously harsh American Idol judge.

After each of the 10 contestants performed, three finalists were chosen by a combination of the judges' opinions and the audience's ballots. Each of the three finalists, Reiter, Randi Katz, 29, and Michaël Knafo, 19, returned with another song.

All three reached back to before they were born for their second-round material, with both Reiter and Katz choosing Aretha Franklin songs (Respect and Think, respectively) and Knafo singing one by Nickolas Ashford and Valerie Simpson that was made famous by both Marvin Gaye and Diana Ross (Ain't No Mountain High Enough).

Only the judges voted in the final round, choosing Reiter as the Jewish Idol and Katz as runner-up.

As Jewish Idol, Reiter will receive a portfolio of photographs and a demo CD produced by a professional music studio (Junited Records), and she will also have a concert arranged for her.

The show also featured three non-competitive performances. The first was a choreographed hip-hop dance number by three young women, and the second was a rap song performed by a nine-year-old calling himself "One-88." Sauvé-Castonguay referred to him as "a future Jewish Idol."

As well, at the end of the evening, all 10 contestants returned to the stage and sang a Hebrew song together.

Centre Hillel's Jewish Idol committee was co-chaired by Laura Sonego and Steve Sebag, who promised the competition would return next year.

Jewish community rejuvenated in Muslim Kazan

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

KAZAN, RUSSIA — A look of utter amazement comes over Jenya Sontz's face when she's told about the harassment experienced by Jewish students on Canadian college campuses. She shakes her head in disbelief when she's told about the mini-riot at Concordia University, which prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking, and the day-to-day anti-Israel agitation that often spills over into intimidation.

At the numerous universities and technical schools in Kazan, Jewish students have experienced nothing like that, she said. In fact, non-Jewish students in the Muslim region of Tatarstan are curious, even respectful, of their Jewish colleagues.

"The most popular reaction when I say I am a Jew is, 'wow, say a few words in Jewish,'" she says.

Sontz, director of Hillel programming for more than 500 Jewish students in Kazan, the capital of Tatarstan, said in the post-Soviet republic students take an interest in other groups and are respectful of each other's heritage.

While the Tatar people are of Turkish descent, there are also Arab students on campus who are eager to discuss current events in the Middle East.

When it comes to travel, "non-Jewish young people admire our opportunity to go to Israel," particularly through Taglit (Birthright). So far, more than 100 Kazan students have visited the Jewish state on Birthright missions.

"We think young people can discuss without a fight, without fanaticism," Sontz said. "Thank God, Tatarstan is such a tolerant republic."

More than a decade after the collapse of communism, 20-somethings and those younger are free to explore their Jewish identities and many avail themselves of the cultural and historical programming now available in Kazan. "Older people envy us because they say they never had that opportunity," Sontz said.

While younger people are interested in developing a firm Jewish identity, those in their 30s and 40s show only modest interest in Jewish programs and traditions. That is a result of 70 years of Communist government, which stifled religious and nationalist identification, Sontz said.

The Sontz family, however, refused to be cowed. Her late father, Leonid, was a klezmer musician who popularized the Jewish art form, at first in underground circles. Sontz grew up in a family that had a keen sense of Jewish traditions.

With the end of the Soviet Union, Jewish life in Kazan has returned to the open and the community boasts a wide range of facilities offering religious, cultural and social activities.

Pavel Vasenin, 19, is co-ordinator of Hillel projects in Kazan and a regular drop-in at the student club, Afifon, located above the community's synagogue. Like student centres in North America, the rooms are sparse, barely decorated. But they provide a handy venue for Jewish kids to gather, schmooze and, what else, eat.

"I'm here because I'm learning more about Jewish history and Jewish tradition," he said. "Two years ago, I never knew there were Jewish organizations in Kazan. When I came here, I adapted very quickly. And now I even started to do my own research on anti-Semitism, as well as co-ordinate Jewish programs."

For many years, Judaism never played a big role in his life. He was aware his mother's passport had the designation, "Jew" in it, but she never overtly identified herself as such. Today, Vasenin is the only one in his family who attends synagogue – "and I have a big family," he said.

Students gather at Afifon club

"I feel myself more protected... more calm here."

Over at the Chesed seniors' club, the elderly are experiencing something similar – the sense of camaraderie, shared history and familiarity that was hard to find in communist times.

Sofia Borodova, 45, directs cultural programming at the Kazan community centre. She, too, knew little about Judaism until relatively late in her life. It was her interest in Jewish culture that first linked her to things Jewish. In the 1980s, she recalled, a Jewish cultural society called Menorah was quite popular, while Sontz's concerts sometimes attracted 1,000 people. The first public seders attracted hundreds more. Ironically, they were held in the former headquarters of the Komsomol Union – the communist youth movement.

With the 1990s liberalization, many Jews left Kazan, mostly for Israel. At the same time, community leaders discovered many others reclaiming their Jewish heritage. Kazan residents joke "there were 7,000 Jews, 4,000 left and now we have 11,000," Borodova said.

Rabbi Yitzchok Gorelick believes the most accurate figure today is a Jewish population of 7,000 to 10,000 – or at least that many with some Jewish roots.

All aspects of the Jewish life cycle are now available in Kazan, including chupahs at weddings and mikvahs.

While most of her friends are not Jewish, Borodova said they are interested in learning about her heritage. What's more, "we have a ladies' club and non-Jewish women come to learn about Jewish traditions."

Borodova would like to see her two sons marry Jewish girls. "When I met a Jewish guy, I felt something natural, something dear to me. Many Jewish ladies of an older age who come to Chesed, who married non-Jews, they're saying they made a mistake. I wouldn't say my personal life is so unclouded or ideal, but this personal unity makes our family strong."

Religious life is co-ordinated by Rabbi Gorelick, who is held in high regard in Kazan. "We were lucky that we have this rabbi," Borodova said. "In other places, there are problems between the religious and the secular organizations. [Rabbi Gorelick] is a very understanding person, because our people are not familiar with religious life. But the rabbi does his best to take into consideration that the people are not used to it. It's very hard for them."

Borodova believes that while strict religious observance is not prevalent, "there are key values... We find the common values and Chabad has the highest authority in the community.'

Rabbi Gorelick points to the co-operation between Chabad, secular organizations and outside Jewish agencies in rejuvenating Kazan's Jewish life. He sat with the community board to brainstorm ways of raising money to upgrade the community building, which was returned to the community in 1995. Chabad committed to repairing the main-floor sanctuary, while local philanthropists donated significant sums for the rest of the structure. The Joint Distribution Committee gave funds to operate Chesed and a library, while the Russian Jewish Congress helped in the reconstruction of the third floor. Altogether, $700,000 US was raised.

Chabad pays 50 per cent of the continuing operating expenses for community programs, including the kindergarten, which serves 17 children, and events such as community seders and the summer camp, which is attended by about 100 youngsters.

Rabbi Gorelick acknowledges the level of religious observance in Kazan is not where he would like it to be, but few people eat pork and in other ways, "many have taken the first step" toward a more observant lifestyle, he said.

Rabbi Gorelick believes bringing the community along to a more traditional lifestyle is a long-term project and cannot be forced down people's throats.

Twice a year, Rabbi Gorelick travels to small towns in the region around Kazan to minister to the clusters of Jews there. A few hundred can be found in Izhevsk, Yoshkar-Ola and Cheboksary, he said. Chabad also dispatches yeshiva students to these towns to help conduct holiday services, he added.

Although his yeshiva education contained no lessons in administrative and organizational skills, Chabad emissaries are expected to learn on their feet. In the years since he accepted his posting to Kazan, Chabad has begun to organize seminars on these vital topics and he has flown to Moscow, New York and Israel to attend these conferences.

Paul Lungen was recently a guest of Chabad Lubavitch in Russia.

225 INVESTMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Apartment & Sixplex Owners: Better to pay capital gains than have vacancies of 10%!

Vacancies are sharply up and take months to fill. Utilities and taxes are skyrocketing. A prudent investor must sell now. First time housing more affordable than ever. Don't get caught short. Legislation will change detrimentally next year. It is proposed that vacant units will no longer go for market rents. Sell now and profit by it while you can.

'Paddling papa' among Jewish returnees at Olympics

By E.B. SOLOMON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Joe Jacobi's pain as he prepares for the Olympics is more emotional than physical.

The canoeist and kayaker says he misses his three-year-old daughter, Seu Jane – named for the Spanish village that hosted some rowing competitions in the 1992 Summer Games – who is at home with his wife in Tennessee.

The pursuit of an Olympic medal usually conjures up a youthful single-mindedness, but like Jacobi, 34, many of the 15 Jewish athletes competing for the U.S. team at the Athens Games are veteran athletes who competed in previous Olympics.

Jacobi, nicknamed the "paddling papa," won gold at the Olympics in 1992, the same year he was named USA canoe/kayak male athlete of the year.

Another veteran, swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg, a triple gold-medal winner at the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, Australia, will also compete in Athens, when the Games get underway Aug. 13.

Krayzelburg, a Jewish immigrant from Odessa – in what is now Ukraine – has been a Jewish role model of sorts, once telling reporters that "being Jewish is part of me, it's part of my culture."

He got his first American swimming experience, and his first job, at a Jewish community centre in Los Angeles shortly after his family arrived there in 1988 from the Soviet Union.

After setting world records in the 100-metre and 200-metre backstroke at the 2000 Olympics, he participated in the Maccabi Games in Israel.

Nearly 29, an age considered ancient in a sport mostly dominated by teenagers and those in their early 20s, Krayzelburg made headlines in mid-July when he qualified for the American team by finishing the 100-metre backstroke in 54.06 seconds, behind world champion Aaron Perisol.

His teammate, 28-year-old Jason Lezak, another Jewish swimmer, won the 100-metre freestyle after setting a new American record of 48.17 seconds in the semifinals.

"Based on what you hear in the general public, you'd think there wasn't much representation, but the list we have is very impressive," said Jed Margolis, executive director of Maccabi USA/Sports for Israel. In certain sports, he added, Jews "are at the top of the world."

Israeli tennis players set record in Toronto

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

For the second time in four years, Israeli tennis players set a new record for their country at the recent Tennis Masters Toronto event held at the Rexall Centre at York University.

The Israeli Davis Cup team of Andy Ram and Jonathan Erlich finished as the first Israeli doubles quarterfinalists in tournament history.

Although the results were not as dramatic as in 2000, when Harel Levy, Israel's top-ranked singles player, finished second in the same tournament, the impressive results of the Israelis drew the attention of many fans and competitors.

Erlich and Ram began the tournament by defeating crowd favourites Marat Safan of Russia and David Nalbandian of Argentina 4-6, 6-1,6-2, then upset seventh seeded Martin Damm and Cyril Suk of Czechoslovakia 4-6, 6-3, 6-4, before losing to Daniel Nestor of Toronto and Mark Knowles of Bahamas 6-4, 3-6, 6-3.

Unlike singles play, doubles competition involve co-ordination of players in net play, speed, power and concentration. "It is so important that we play with an understanding of what we can do against our opponents. Jonathan (Erlich) and I knew each other for many years; since we were juniors. I never had any success until I started playing with him in 2003," said Ram.

Remarkably, the duo dropped their first sets in all of their matches and, with the exception of the quarter-final match, rallied for victories due to inspired net play and a belief that they would break their opponents.

"We knew it was only a matter of time before we would break our opponents. In the match against the Czechs (Damm and Suk), we read their serves well and knew we could beat them if we pushed them far enough with volleys and backhands. Our strategy worked and the good level of play gives us confidence that we can win a medal at the Olympics," said Erlich.

Erlich, 27, and Ram, 24, have been a formidable duo since teaming in 2003. They have won three doubles titles and finished as semifinalists at Wimbledon in 2003. Ram also finished as a mixed doubles finalist in 2003, losing to tennis legend Martina Navratilova and Leander Paes.

Both players immigrated to Israel as children from Argentina (Erlich) and Uruguay (Ram) and share a love of Israel. Erlich and Ram are so proud to represent Israel in the Olympics, they can't understand why some American athletes – as is the case with top American basketball stars – wanted to bypass the Olympic Games.

"It means so much to our people back home to do well. We can't be concerned with security. In Israel, we live with a security alert every day. We are hoping to bring back a medal for our country and with that goal in mind, Andy and I want to make our country proud," said Erlich.

Erlich and Ram are ranked among the world's top 20 doubles team, and their opponents feel it is not farfetched for them to win a medal at the Olympics.

"We beat them, but they are going to be tough because you can never let up against them," said Nestor following his victory against the duo. "They have been playing together for longer than most of the teams at the Olympics, and I think they have an excellent chance to win a medal for Israel."

Five Jewish players (Harel Levy; Noam Okun; Ram of Israel; Gaston Etlis of Argentina; and American Glenn Weiner) entered the tournament through the qualifying rounds. None of them survived to the main draw. The only Jewish player in the main draw, 13th seed Nicolas Massu of Chile, lost his opening-round match to Thomas Johansson of Sweden 6-4, 6-4.

Levy is attempting to regain the form he established in 2000, following his runner-up finish in Toronto and a top-30 ranking. He underwent hip surgery in late 2001 and hasn't returned to his earlier form.

"It was so tough because I had to learn to walk again after surgery. However, I look to players like Agassi to give me inspiration. He was ranked as low as 300 and then he came back. I hope that will happen for me," said Levy.

At 26, Levy still has a few more years left to regain form. However, the road ahead is tough. He lost his first-round match event in a Granby challenger (for low-ranked players) tournament a few weeks before the Toronto event.

DROP SHOTS… Budding Canadian tennis star Sharon Fichman of Toronto has earned an automatic berth to the Canadian tennis team at the Maccabi Games in Israel next July by winning the Canadian 18 and under tournament last month at age 13. Fichman is the youngest Canadian ever to earn a berth on the tennis team without qualifying. Next summer, Fichman makes her debut on the pro circuit at the Rogers At&T Cup in Toronto. Fichman also competes in December in the 18 and under event at the Orange Bowl Junior Tennis tournament in Miami.

Take, for example, Sada and Emily Jacobson. This dynamic duo of Jewish sisters may be Olympic neophytes, but they will enter the Olympic arena with high expectations.

Sada Jacobson, 21, is the top-ranked woman fencer in the world and in the United States and has said that making the Olympic squad is honour enough.

Her teammates likely are honoured to be competing alongside her, though – not only is she the first American woman and second American fencer to reach the top of the world rankings, she is also a four-time world championship team member and a two-time National Collegiate Athletic Association sabre champion.

Sada's younger sister, Emily, 17, is just a few lunges behind, and the pair's domination of women's fencing has been compared to that of tennis' well-known sisters, Venus and Serena Williams.

Emily, one of two athletes to receive a 2002 Jules D. Major Award to Jewish High School Athletes of the Year, was ranked second in U.S. sabre fencing in 2003 and was a 2003 Pan American Games bronze medalist.

The Games in Athens will also be the first for 28-year-old fencer Dan Kellner. This six-time world championship team member finished second in the foil competition at the national championships in 1997, 1998 and 2000.

But in 2000, Kellner did not make the Olympic squad. After a year's hiatus, he came back and won a gold medal at the 2003 Pan American games and his first national championship in 2004.

For Kellner, making the Olympic team reflects the eagerness of a younger generation that is following closely in the footsteps of those before them.

"My friends who have done it before say it's an experience that will change your life," he said in an interview with the New Jersey Jewish News.

At the opening ceremonies, "I plan to heed their advice and walk slowly – you only get once around the track," he said.

In other sports, though, veteran Jewish athletes will be representing the United States.

In track and field, Deena Drossin Kastor, who competed in Sydney, qualified in the marathon; equestrian Margie Engle, a member of the 2000 U.S. Olympic team and the winner of five major equestrian competitions in 2001, will also compete.

Rami Zur, a newcomer to the American team who rowed in the canoe/kayak competition for Israel in 2000, will compete this year for the United States. His dual citizenship allowed him to qualify for both countries' teams.

Autumn in New York

I was 19 years old when The American Musical and Dramatic Academy in New York City accepted me into its acting program. I remember skipping and singing in the street of my usually quiet residential neighborhood, waving my letter of acceptance in the air.

By MIRIAM PORTER

I had worked diligently throughout high school on small acting projects and I was ready to move forward.

That fall, I packed my bags and moved to Manhattan's Upper West Side to pursue my dream. I rented a tiny room in the Beacon Hotel on Broadway, which I shared with two other students from my school. (And a nice family of furry brown rats, but that's another story.)

I experienced so many wonderful moments and events during my time in New York. I remember walking more than 40 blocks to Times Square at midnight in the pouring rain to watch the stage version of The Rocky Horror Picture Show with students I barely knew. I fought the crowds at Macy's and Bloomingdale's for the best bargain. I ate salty pretzels and hot potato knishes I purchased from street vendors. I bravely took the subways and got lost among the maze of crossing tracks. I studied with inspiring acting coaches and performed in off-Broadway theatrical productions. And I learned about the great culture surrounding me. However, one event in particular stands out for me.

It was December 8, the anniversary of the death of former Beatle John Lennon. My theatre class consisted of 25 students, and we were all passionate and energized about living in Manhattan. The other students were from the United States and I alone represented Canada.

We were all actors away from home for the first time and also Lennon fans, so we decided to pay a tribute to him in our own special way.

Every year on the anniversary of his death, people gather in Strawberry Fields in Central Park to pay their respects to the fallen legend. I heard that his widow, Yoko Ono, even makes an appearance each year and leaves a dozen red roses.

We rehearsed a mini-performance every day after school for a week and were well prepared. We were determined to be a part of something that was so special and unique.

We arrived in the park just after sunset. The multi-hued leaves had already fallen from the trees and they crackled under my feet. It was one of the few nights left that year in which you would be warm enough in a light jacket.

The crowd of people gathered in the park represented Manhattan's diverse communities. Lennon had many adoring fans. They saw us dressed in our flowing white shirts and white pants and were intrigued. We picked a spot and started our performance.

The music from our old stereo, which we had borrowed from the academy, started to play and we dramatically lit the candles, which we placed around us on the ground. We began to sing as we danced and acted out the lyrics to Lennon's song "Give Peace a Chance." Within minutes, the crowd surrounded us and other people from the park came to join in. Together, we sang the lyrics of Lennon's famous song, "All we are saying is give peace a chance." I had not sung in public since my bat mitzvah, during which I almost passed out from absolute terror, but that night I felt free.

Our performance had such a positive impact that when we were finished, we started again from the beginning for the next group of people who had arrived. We repeated our performance throughout the evening. I was so enthralled that I forgot to look for Ono, but I believe she showed up to leave her roses

During my time at the academy, I performed in many plays by award-winning, brilliant playwrights, but my performance in Strawberry Fields left the most significant impact on my life. I was living away from home for the first time in a new city and attending a school I read about in magazines. Anything and everything was possible.

Now, as a 30-something, my life has changed considerably since those days. But I never stop dreaming. No matter where my life takes me in the future, I will always have my memories of autumn in New York.

PAYING TRIBUTE: Toronto Holocaust survivor Kurt Herzstein (far right) and his wife Shirley recently paid a visit to Herzstein's German hometown of Duisburg, north of Dusseldorf, to take part in a ceremony that dedicated a memorial to his late mother Hertha, murdered in Sobibor in 1943. Herzstein helped lay a Stolperstein ("stumbling stone") outside his former home, one of several hundred brass markers set into sidewalks across Germany in an innovative effort to pay tribute to Holocaust victims. The moving ceremony featured a cellist who played Kol Nidre and students from a local high school.

Making good on 'Never again'

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

This summer, I have written a series of articles encouraging the Jewish community to respond to the genocide in Sudan, what the United Nations has called "the world's worst humanitarian disaster."

I wrote about the disconnect between the message of "Never again" – that if wickedness should befall another people, we will respond, knowing the pain of the Holocaust – and our limited response when challenged with the real deal.

Today, I overflow with Jewish pride as I write this article, knowing that parts of the Toronto Jewish community, and the world Jewish community, have started to respond robustly to the weeping of the people of Darfur.

Over the last few weeks, a number of local organizations – including Canadians Against Slavery and Torture, B'nai Brith Canada, the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee – have developed a solid strategy to fight the war and help the refugees of western Sudan.

The strategy includes a plan for a rally in Ottawa, letter-writing to MPs, a meeting with Prime Minister Paul Martin, acts of civil disobedience and a relief operation.

The CJN has featured Sudan on its front page, as well as in a prominent editorial calling for Jewish activism as 1,000 people a day die in Darfur.

The Canadian coalition is central to relief operations that would include the distribution of pharmaceuticals (donated by local Jewish entrepreneurs) and nutritional supplements, as well as medical care and the building and development of refugee camp infrastructure.

The Canadian Jewish coalition is also part of a network of Jewish and non-Jewish North American organizations – made up of humanitarian groups, synagogue and church councils, and federations – that recently met with Elie Wiesel to discuss a strategy that includes a massive rally in front of the United Nations.

The coalition is currently setting up meetings with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell. A comprehensive call-to-action has been drafted and will be published in international newspapers. Some members of the Canadian coalition are signatories.

The American Jewish World Service – a dynamic humanitarian grant-giving organization headed by prominent Jewish activist, politician and feminist Ruth Messinger – has granted funds to Doctors Without Borders, a prominent humanitarian organization, to assist in refugee camps in neighbouring Chad.

Indeed, donations and requests for volunteer opportunities have increased dramatically. Recently, Anita Ekstein, a local Holocaust activist, told me about some of her discussions with Holocaust survivors who have been driven to respond to the barbarism inflicted upon black African men, women and children in Sudan.

All is not perfect, however. I have been yelled at by some Jews who accuse us of misusing Jewish resources for people who "would likely kill us given the chance." One active community member, a very good man, said to me, "Why the hell should we help others when nobody helped us [during the Holocaust]?"

I responded that Judaism abounds with instructions to involve ourselves in the world community, and logic dictates that we should support others, knowing the pain our people experienced when others remained silent about Auschwitz. He disagreed with these thoughts and my position that we need to strengthen the Jewish people by reaching out to others at a grassroots level, thereby creating alliances and friendships that would be useful in our times of need.

Judaism requires all Jews to fix the world. Some respond by devoting themselves to the needs of the Jewish world. Sometimes, however, a raw and disgusting sore appears on the face of humankind that requires all of us to respond. Sudan is one such example.

Never again. A message with honour.

"I believe there are no strangers in God's creations." – Elie Wiesel

Israeli official asks for sanctions on Iran over Olympic boycott

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel's top judo official called on the sport's governing body to punish Iran on Monday for apparently refusing to contest an Olympic bout with an Israeli.

"I think the International Judo Federation must stand and say that we cannot involve politics in sport, and I think also they must punish them because it is not the first time that they have done this," Eddy Koaz, president of the Israeli Judo Federation, told Reuters.

"We cannot let them just do it, because if they do it and nothing happens, other countries will do it again. We must be tough in this case and punish them," he added, though he declined to say what sanction he favoured.

Judo champion pulls out of Games

After failing to make the weight for Sunday's first-round under-66-kilogram bout against Israel's Udi Vaks, two-time world champion Arash Miresmaeili was quoted as saying he reported overweight to avoid fighting, out of sympathy with the Palestinian people.

A spokesperson for Iran's Olympic Committee said he had been told to pull out, in line with Iran's national policy toward Israel.

The International Judo Federation (IJF), due to discuss the case again on Monday after an inconclusive emergency session on Sunday, said it needed more evidence before taking action.

How the Holocaust rocked Geddy Lee

By SCOTT R. BENARDE
Special to The CJN

Canadian rock veterans Rush will draw from an impressive song catalogue spanning four decades on its current 30th anniversary tour, including classics such as New World Man, Tom Sawyer and Freewill.

But it is another song in the Rush repertoire that concertgoers should pay close attention to when the band wraps up the North American leg of the tour on Aug. 21 and 22 in Montreal and Toronto respectively.

Red Sector A, from the 1984 album Grace Under Pressure, comes from a deeply emotional and personal place in the heart of lead singer and bassist Geddy Lee.

The seeds for the song were planted nearly 60 years ago in April 1945 when British soldiers liberated the Nazi concentration camp Bergen-Belsen. Lee's mother, Manya (now Mary) Rubenstein, was among the survivors. (His father Morris Weinrib was liberated from Dachau a few weeks later.)

"The whole album," Lee says of Grace Under Pressure, "is about being on the brink and having the courage and strength to survive."

Though Red Sector A, like much of the album from which it comes, is set in a bleak, apocalyptic future, the "psychology" of the song, as Lee calls it, comes directly from a story his mother told him about the day she was liberated.

"I once asked my mother her first thoughts upon being liberated," Lee says during a phone conversation. "She didn't believe [liberation] was possible. She didn't believe that if there was a society outside the camp how they could allow this to exist, so she believed society was done in."

Rush lead singer Geddy Lee and his mother, Mary Rubenstein.

In fact, when Rubenstein looked out the window of a camp building she was working in on April 15, 1945, and saw guards with both arms raised, she thought they were doing a double salute just to be arrogant. She did not realize British forces had overrun the camp.

Rubinstein and her fellow prisoners, says Lee, "were so malnourished, their brains were not functioning, and they couldn't conceive they'd be liberated," because they thought civilized society no longer existed.

It is easy to see why Lee's mother had given up on civilization. She and her future husband Weinrib were still in their teens – and strangers to one another until they were interred in a labour camp in their hometown of Staracohwice (also known as Starchvitzcha), Poland in 1941. Prisoners there were forced to work in a lumber mill, stone quarry, and uniform and ammunition manufacturing plants.

CANADA

Tape Barred for Hate

OTTAWA — The Canada Border Services Agency stopped a cassette tape containing a speech by a late U.S. white supremacist from entering Canada in April on grounds it is hate literature, the Ottawa Citizen reported. In the February 2002 recording, William Pierce alleges that CanWest Global Communications, publisher of such newspapers as the Citizen and the National Post, is part of a Jewish conspiracy to control the media and that its owners, the Asper family, exert "monopoly Jewish control of the Canadian mass media." He also said the late Izzy Asper banned articles critical of Israel from CanWest papers. Pierce wrote the novel The Turner Diaries, which was cited as inspiration by Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh.

Natives Tour Israel

WINNIPEG — Thirty native leaders from Manitoba and Northern Ontario were in Israel for nine days last week to learn about the Holocaust and Jewish culture. The trip, led by Rev. Raymond McLean of Southeast Aboriginal Ministries, was part of a Jewish-native dialogue started last year by B'nai Brith Canada after former national native leader David Ahenakew praised Adolf Hitler.

WORLD

Alleged Guard Pursued

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Justice Department wants the U.S. government to revoke the citizenship of an alleged concentration camp guard. The department's Nazi-hunting unit, the Office of Special Investigations, says Anton Geiser was a member of the SS Death Head's Battalion at Sachsenhausen in 1943 and served at Buchenwald, and he lied about his wartime service when he applied to enter the United States in 1956.

Lyon Graves Vandalized

LYON — Some 60 graves were daubed with swastikas, Nazi symbols and anti-Muslim expressions at a Jewish cemetery in Lyon last Monday. The cemetery is the only Jewish graveyard in the centre of Lyon, which has France's third-largest Jewish community. Two days later, 1,000 people, including local leaders such as the president of the regional council and Lyon's archbishop, attended a rally at the site denouncing the attack. The head of the region's Muslim Council read a statement condemning the desecration on behalf of the city's religious leaders. Two men arrested late Monday are in custody. The incident comes after the July 28 discovery that 32 graves were desecrated in a Jewish cemetery near Strasbourg.

Gravestones Toppled

PRAGUE — A Jewish cemetery was desecrated in the Czech Republic. Unknown perpetrators toppled 80 gravestones last month in the cemetery in Hranice na Morave, which dates back to the 1600s.

Charity Status Revoked

LONDON — Britain is removing Betar-Tagar, a right-leaning Zionist group, from its list of officially sanctioned charities. The Charity Commission of England and Wales said Betar-Tagar is a political organization, not a charity, and had not filed a financial statement since 1999, despite repeated requests. The move strips the group of non-profit status. Betar-Tagar blamed Muslim pressure for the move.

Israeli Sued Governor

NEWARK — New Jersey's governor resigned last week amid reports of a sexual harassment lawsuit filed by an Israeli man. James McGreevey announced he was quitting after admitting he had an affair with a man and is gay. The man is Golan Cipel, an Israeli who was once McGreevey's homeland security adviser and later liaison to the Jewish community, ABC News reported. The two met in Israel in 2000 when McGreevey went there with some New Jersey Jewish federations. Cipel left to work in the private sector two years ago.

Students Harassed

OSWIECIM — Jewish college students from Israel, the United States and Poland were verbally assaulted by three French male tourists at the site of the Auschwitz death camp last week, the Jerusalem Post reported. After seeing a student with an Israeli flag, one man ran at the students and shouted anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli insults as they went through a model gas chamber and crematorium. The men were eventually separated from the group.

Israeli Immigrants Overtake Argentines

WINNIPEG — Despite the Winnipeg Jewish community's efforts to attract Argentine Jews, figures from the city's Jewish Family and Child Service show Israelis have overtaken them as the largest group of Jews coming here from outside Canada.

In the first six months of 2004, 42 out of 78 Jewish families who immigrated to Manitoba's capital were from Israel, while 31 came from South America, Winnipeg's Jewish Post & News reported. Most of the Israelis cite job security as a chief reason for coming, while some "just want a calmer place to be," said Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, director of planning for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal.

Rosenberg-Cohen said the federation doesn't do anything to encourage Israelis to come, but it also doesn't turn them away if they show interest. She added she doesn't know if the Israeli influx will keep up, "but over the next six months at least, the vast majority of immigrants will be from Israel."

The Winnipeg Jewish community has been actively recruiting Argentine Jews as part of a plan to increase its population from about 15,000 to 18,000 by 2010. Rosenberg-Cohen said the number of newcomers from the troubled South American country is down lately because many of the "large number" who applied over the past two years to come have already arrived. Like other Jewish arrivals, she said, the Israelis are coming under a Manitoba program that speeds up immigration for those with skills needed in the province.

Troubled Jewish youth make pilgrimage to Israel

Special trip aims to break cycle of despair and encourage aliyah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Trip participants and escorts gather under a Jewish Agency for Israel banner prior to leaving for the Jewish state last week. [Ron Csillag photo]

"I'm pretty pumped," announces Rachel Danzinger, 18, while chewing gum and sipping coffee. "I feel good, man."

Now "in between" high schools, Rachel lives on her own and is, as she puts it, "working hard at life." She was raised "always knowing I was Jewish. We celebrated the major holidays, but not much else."

Standing at the frenzied El Al counter at Toronto's Pearson International Airport, she knows she's about to embark on a journey of a lifetime.

However, she's outwardly blasé about her long trip this day to Israel. "I'm looking forward to it but it'll be kind of like a vacation," she shrugs.

But a needed one. The point of the tour Rachel is taking with 11 other Jews aged 17 to 24 is, at least until their return on Aug. 26, not only to experience Israel and promote aliyah, but to break the cycle of despair that many of the participants find themselves in.

This trip to Israel – dubbed "From Darkness to Light" – is like no other. Perhaps the first of its kind in the world, it's geared to young, local Jews with a history of substance abuse, homelessness, spotty school records, trouble with the law and problems with parents. They have flown below the Jewish community's radar not because they lack Jewish identity – all are eager to see Israel – but because their troubles have made them almost invisible.

Volunteer remembered for her willingness to help others

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Aviva Barth, 30, who was recently killed in an accident while scuba diving at Big Bay Point on Lake Simcoe, truly knew the meaning of giving back to the community, says her sister Jennifer.

When growing up in Guelph, says Barth, her sister Aviva, a Toronto consultant with the firm Bearing Point, was part of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region's outreach program for high school students in smaller communities.

"She enjoyed it so much, that four years ago she began volunteering with the program so she could help give other teens the same experience."

Being part of that group changed Aviva's whole Jewish life, says Barth.

"We had a Jewish upbringing, but not everyone around us was Jewish. This group was made up of kids with similar backgrounds. It brought people together."

Judaism was a major part of Aviva's life, says Barth. "She would go to synagogue and remark that people around the world are doing the same thing. She found that incredible."

Fauna Mandel-Grill, co-ordinator, community services and youth outreach, with the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, says the two met when Aviva began volunteering with the program.

"She was not only a dedicated volunteer, but she was a good friend. She always had the time to attend Shabbatons and be there for the kids. I had already booked her for a weekend in October.

"She did it because she believed in what we did, and she knew the importance of meeting other people in the same situation. This is a huge loss to everyone, including the kids in the small communities."

Noah Wagner, Aviva's boyfriend of eight months and a diving instructor, says that Aviva took part in last week's dive as part of a certification course. "We had booked a trip to Israel to visit family at the end of the summer, and we had also planned to do some diving in Eilat.

"She wanted to share diving with me, because she knew how passionate I am about it."

Aviva had just completed her second dive of the day, says Wagner, and after she floated up, a boat sped by and hit her. "[Another instructor] and I tried to revive her; we did everything we were trained to do, but her injuries were too massive."

Aviva Barth was recently killed in an accident while scuba diving.

Wagner says, "The word tragedy just doesn't describe what happened.

"Aviva was unique, full of life, and everyone was her best friend. They sought her advice and wanted to hear her opinion. She was generous, giving and endlessly beautiful."

She also argued for what she knew was right, says Wagner. "She once challenged some protesters in front of the Israeli Consulate, and they had no comeback."

Insp. Tom McDonald, media officer for the South Simcoe police, says police are still trying to determine the identification of the vessel that struck Barth, and are seeking any potential witnesses.

Memorial donations can be made to United Israel Appeal earmarked for the Aviva Barth High School Outreach Fund, Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, 416-636-7655, ext. 0, or mail to the fund c/o United Israel Appeal, 4600 Bathurst St., third floor, Toronto, M2R 3V2.

BRIS FOR CUBAN BOY: The Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ) recently organized a circumcision for one of the younger members of Cuba's Jewish community, a boy named Ariel. A mohel specializing in adult circumcision was flown in especially for this occasion. Pictured are Ariel with CFCJ director Rabbi Shimon Aisenbach, who is holding a sign proclaiming the boy's new Hebrew name, and Ariel's parents. Just prior to the bris, the CFCJ sent its 86th mission to Cuba, primarily for the summer camp it runs each year for Jewish children in Havana.

Life insurers change policies on travel to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A number of options appear to be developing for travellers concerned about being denied life insurance coverage if they visit Israel.

Manulife Financial, the largest life insurance company in Canada and fifth largest in the world, has tentatively agreed to write policies with an exclusion clause that will not void coverage for those who visit Israel, according to financial adviser David Brown.

In addition, Brown's family firm, Al G. Brown & Associates, is working with a large international insurer based in the United States to agree to write a policy with an exclusion clause that would not cover death due to terrorist attack while on a visit to Israel.

Pursuing yet another track, Brown said, "We're trying to get agreement from the reinsurance community that travel to Israel is not an excessive risk."

Since the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000, life insurance companies have denied coverage to new applicants – the new rules did not affect those who had already obtained life insurance coverage – if they indicated they had visited Israel or intended to visit in the next year. Policies were also denied travelers to North Korea, Iraq, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Syria.

Reinsurance companies, such as Swiss Re and Munich Re, which assume most of the risk in life insurance policies, had determined that travel to Israel added a risk they did not want to cover, Brown said.

Since reinsurers are generally responsible for most of the payouts for successful claims, and since they dwarf most Canadian life insurers in size, they called the shots when it came to issuing these policies, Brown said.

Earlier this year, Marlene Klassen, a spokesperson for Canada Life, said, "We adhere strictly to the foreign residence guidelines of our reinsurance companies, who research and update these guidelines several times per year. Political unrest is only one of the reasons contributing to substandard and uninsurable foreign travel and residency."

The reinsurers also rely on government travel bulletins warning about dangers in certain countries, she added.

Al G. Brown & Associates has been lobbying the reinsurers to convince them there are no hard data to show travellers to Israel are at added risk. "I feel if we get one or two reinsurers to agree, then others will fall into line. That's what happened in the United States," he said, where a lawsuit in California prompted some insurers to offer policies up to $1 million if the visit to Israel lasts four weeks or less.

"The process is moving along," he said.

Insurers now seem to accept that the security situation in Israel has improved and the number of Israel-bound travellers "is not huge compared to the international market, so it's not a big risk, really," Brown said.

In the United States, meanwhile, Allstate Life Insurance Co. announced recently it would reverse its position and allow customers who plan to travel to Israel, the West Bank or Gaza to apply for life insurance, the Chicago Sun-Times reported.

Allstate was one of 13 insurers alleged in a California lawsuit of carrying on unfair business practice of denying insurance to travellers to Israel. As part of a settlement, Allstate agreed to no longer consider past or future travel to Israel as a condition of issuing life insurance policies. In March, Rep. Rahm Emanuel and three other congressmen introduced legislation that would have prohibited insurers from denying or cancelling policies to customers who had travelled to Israel and 26 other countries on the U.S. State Department's travel warnings list. That bill is pending, the Sun-Times reported.

York police arrest suspect in hate incidents

York Regional Police announced late last week that it had arrested an 18-year-old man in connection with hate-related incidents in Markham in late June.

Kassin Cuffe of Markham has been charged with 12 counts of mischief to property over $5,000.

The incidents that led to Cuffe's arrest took place in the early morning hours of June 27 and 28, when more than 25 anti-Semitic and anti-black messages were spray-painted on businesses, homes, cars, fences and railway property in Unionville. The graffiti included swastikas.

Police have asked the Crown Attorney's office in nearby Newmarket to determine whether additional hate crime charges should be laid against Cuffe.

Jewish Day School Alternative

Every Jewish parent wants the best Jewish education for their child, but Jewish day school is not always an option.

Beth Tikvah is offering a day school alternative for children who wish to continue their formal Jewish schooling. Our program focuses on teaching Jewish History, Tanach, Hebrew and Jewish culture - the cornerstones of Jewish knowledge - in a structured, formal environment, to help ensure that Jewish children receive the education they deserve.

Special trip aims to break cycle of despair

Gadi Anavi, the bear-like shaliach for the Israel Aliyah Office in Toronto who has spent the better part of the year scouring the city for young people who don't fit the traditional Jewish mould, calls them "kids in the shadows."

"This is very emotional for me," says Anavi. "Not because the program has been a success, but because these kids, if it weren't for us, would never go to Israel. It's a chance for them to hook up with their identity."

By "us," Anavi means himself and Lillian Freedman, a freelance social worker who's dedicated the last five years of her life to finding and housing homeless Jews in Toronto, as well as helping those on the fringes. Last winter, the two got together and began plotting their improbable project.

What the participants on this trip share is a life of turbulence, Freedman says.

"There's been drugs, alcohol, welfare, being shunted from one place to another," says Freedman. "But mainly, they have all felt, at one time or another, a sense of not belonging – to the Jewish community or really anything."

Freedman knows some of the participants; others came aboard by word of mouth after a CJN article last April that described the effort. Some, like Joe Anidjar, found out about the trip through Jewish Family & Child Service, where they have been clients.

Anidjar, 21, stands out among a group of fellow male travellers who wear wispy beards, clunky silver jewelry, super-baggy jeans and, in one case, black nail polish.

Anidjar's hair is short and he sports an Israel Defence Forces T-shirt.

"I've always liked to do things on my own. I've lived on my own since I was 19," he says. "And it's been rough. I believe this trip will start my life over."

In fact, he's cleared his calendar for the possibility of staying in Israel for an extended time.

The two-week trip is as ambitious as any tour of Israel from North America. Included are standard tours of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, but there's also an archeological dig, a Bedouin feast, a canoe trip down the Jordan River and lots of free time.

Participants will also be able to tap into counselling, with a view toward making Israel their new home. Should they choose to do that, they'll receive free skills training or high school, life on an all-inclusive absorption centre where they would learn Hebrew, and free undergraduate university classes.

They're being accompanied by Freedman and two other adult escorts.

After some initial funding glitches, the tab for the trip is being picked up by the Jewish Agency for Israel, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada.

As if the scene at the El Al counter wasn't chaotic enough, a group of evangelical Christians came to the airport to see the trip off.

After singing "Give Thanks to the Lord," members of the New Dundee, Ont.-based Return Ministries, which promotes aliyah and travel to Israel, offered their blessings.

"We will pray for you," said ministry director Dean Bye, a well-known Christian Zionist, likening the 12 young travellers to the 12 biblical spies sent by Moses to scout out the land of Canaan.

To keep tabs on the group's progress, visit www.jewishadventures.com/toronto/.

Strange Decisions

In the space of just a few weeks, the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), the national broadcast regulator, announced two decisions that are at odds with each other and should cause the Jewish community concern.

First, the regulator announced that it would permit the Qatar-based Al-Jazeera news channel, described as the CNN of the Arab world but which is known to air anti-Semitic content and beheadings by Islamic fanatics, to be carried on digital cable TV in Canada. At the same time, the regulator denied entry to RAI International, an Italian general interest television network, and to five other foreign-language services seeking places on the dial.

Then, in a decision that is nothing less than a blow to free speech, it announced it would not renew the licence of CHOI, Quebec City's most popular radio station, because of abusive comments by its popular early-morning host, Jeff Fillion.

While supporters of the CRTC decision on Al-Jazeera will note that the regulator also insisted on numerous safeguards and restrictions – the network's programming must be monitored for questionable content – the principle is clear, and disconcerting.

A broadcaster that has a sordid record of airing anti-Jewish hate comments and has been accused of being a propagandist for Osama bin Laden has a legitimate place on Canadian cable. On the other hand, on-air personalities who adopt a Howard Stern approach to radio entertainment and public affairs, and who employ foul language in doing so, do not.

Canadians, it seems, need not be protected from anti-Jewish rants of Mideastern muftis who accuse Jews of using blood on Purim and Passover, but are sensitive flowers in need of safeguarding from tasteless comments about the disabled or women's breasts.

Al-Jazeera is allowed on Canadian cable, but only with safeguards to monitor speech that might violate the Broadcasting Act. CHOI is given no such alternative. It's shut down, completely, for good.

The CRTC is supposed to be an arm's length, apolitical administrative organization, but its members are appointed by cabinet and buy into the kind of paternalistic thinking that deems Canadians in need of being told what they can and cannot watch. The commission acknowledged that it received 9,417 interventions in favour of CHOI and only 38 opposed. But Fillion has attacked the province's sacred cows. He is a federalist and a libertarian. He supports Israel's right to defend itself. And he is unpopular with Quebec's media elite.

Al Jazeera, meanwhile, speaks to a large and growing demographic of Arab-speaking immigrants whose political clout will no doubt expand in years to come, and whose multicultural credentials stand it in good stead with Ottawa decision-makers.

These decisions ought to trouble the Jewish community.

– P.L.

Setting the record straight – 1

I read the brief news item "Mandel runs for mayor," (CJN, Aug. 12), about Stephen Mandel's decision to run for mayor of Edmonton, and I wish him every success. However, you indicated that if Mandel is elected, he would become the second Jewish mayor ever in Western Canada, after Sam Katz, the new mayor of Winnipeg.

I was saddened to see that you had forgotten about the remarkable contributions of the late senator Sid Buckwold, who served honourably as mayor of Saskatoon from 1958 to 1963 and again from 1967 to 1971.

Senator Buckwold was born in Winnipeg in 1916, but spent most of his life in Saskatoon. He was appointed to the Senate in 1971 and made an officer of the Order of Canada in 1995. He died in 2001 at age 84, and is much missed, not only by his friends and family, but by the entire community of Saskatoon, Jews and non-Jews alike.

Setting the record straight – 2

You reported in your Aug. 12 edition that Sam Katz, the new mayor of Winnipeg, is the first Jewish mayor in Western Canada. I must beg to differ, as Katz was bested by my grandfather, Samuel Korbin, by almost 90 years. Samuel Korbin was the mayor of Canora, Sask., from 1914 to 1917.

Down memory lane

Having grown up in New Waterford, N.S., in the 1950s and '60s, I enjoyed your article, "Rose Schwartz Park opens in New Waterford" (CJN, Aug. 12). I can attest to the countless contributions made by Rose and her family to the community. I have fond memories of shopping at the family clothing store, drooling over some of the more elegant ladieswear, anxiously awaiting the end-of-season sales, and, most importantly, observing how customers were treated with dignity and respect. This is a family that has left an indelible mark on their mother's adopted country, and for this we should all be grateful.

Thank you for giving me this trip down memory lane.

Seeking people from Lithuania forest

Emma Karabelnik, 45, a computer specialist living in Israel, is looking for people who may be able to identify the 1,800 names of Jews not already recorded by Yad Vashem who were murdered in the Kausenai Forest just outside Plungyan, now called Plunge, in Lithuania. Her list currently contains nearly 1,000 names.

Karabelnik's efforts will be a valuable contribution to the honouring of the memory of the men, women and children who were shot on July 14 and 15, 1941, by the Germans and their Lithuanian accomplices.

Readers with a Plungyan connection are invited to contact Karabelnik at emma.k@netvision.net.il. The first stage of her work will be completed in September 2004, after which a decision will be made as to how to display the names in Plungyan itself.

White Zimbabweans not in vogue

A couple months ago and with little media fanfare, land owned by whites in Zimbabwe was "repatriated." That's dictator-speak for stolen. I waited on the edge of my seat for the impending uproar by the press, as they are so quick to talk about stateless refugees in other conflicts, but not a peep was heard. I was shocked to find that no one cared about Zimbabweans. Well, it's not that no one cared, it's just that they are white.

There is clearly a different standard for whites, Christians and Jews than for certain groups aligned with the interests or sympathies of the press. When Sudanese Christians are slaughtered, no one cares. When white, well-to-do Zimbabwean lives are ruined, no one cares. But when the Palestinian media darlings revise history with their accounts of vanquished home and land, there is always a listener.

This constant and repeated bias must be relinquished. It is of no consolation to the trampled Zimbabwean farmer or dead Sudanese Christian that their plight is not in vogue.

Treating eating disorders

Much has been said about the signs and symptoms of eating disorders, yet they remain one of the most difficult health problems to treat. Eating disorders are often believed to be about food and nutrition, when really the issue runs far deeper. They are often a relentless pursuit of thinness in order to dull one's emotional pain.

Treatment requires a multi-dimensional approach, including a qualified, extensively trained registered dietitian, psychiatrist, family doctor and psychotherapist, who work together with the victim.

Emotional support from family, friends and professionals is essential. People with eating disorders need unconditional love, support and empathy. Feelings need to be validated, and trust needs to be rebuilt and maintained.

It is disheartening to note that you do not need any qualifications to provide psychotherapy or to call yourself a counsellor. Despite good intentions, unqualified people give false hope to already vulnerable people. They become yet another person who has let the sufferer down.

Treatment, even from qualified people, is often exceptionally costly. This is particularly sad, as it takes a tremendous amount of courage to seek help at all, only to be met with the realization that it comes at a high financial cost.

Waiting lists for government-funded treatment are long – years even. By that time, sufferers can become even more entrenched in their depression and negative mindset.

The National Eating Disorder Information Centre has listings of accredited psychotherapists, dietitians and programs across Canada. Toronto's Sheena's Place offers support to people with eating disorders, their family and friends.

The true path to peace

By JIMMY BITTON

By and large, western political analysts steer clear of criticizing Islam when seeking to explain Muslim hatred toward Israel, for fear of appearing to deviate from the social etiquette of tolerance.

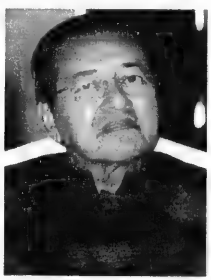
Tolerance is regarded as the best way to protect the liberty of all members of society irrespective of political or religious opinions. But in order to defend our liberty, we must never deceive ourselves into accepting the maxim of unconditional tolerance. Occasionally, we must be intolerant of intolerance. By censuring the Islam of either precept or practice, we run the risk of being labelled Islamophobic; however, the real danger comes from turning a blind eye to the hatred encouraged by the doctrinaire approach to religion so widespread in the Muslim world.

It is not the absence of a plan that has hindered progress toward peace, as is evident in the cries for Israel's destruction prior to the occupation. Take, for example, the 1964 essay written by Abd al-Rahman al-Bazzaz who was a professor of law at the University of Baghdad and a former prime minister of Iraq: "The existence of Israel is a flagrant challenge to our philosophy of life and the ideals for which we live, and a total barrier against the values and aims to which we aspire in the world."

Students burn the Israeli flag at Cairo University during a demonstration March 23. Egyptian students demonstrated in universities across the country in response to Israel's assassination of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas. [RNS/Reuters photo]

The world needs to recognize that even if Israel were to make painful political concessions for the sake of peace, the Muslim campaign to destroy it would continue. As alluded to in the notoriously anti-Semitic address given by former Malaysian prime minister Dr. Mahathir Mohammad on Oct. 16, 2003, at the Tenth Session of the Islamic Summit Conference, "For well over a half-century, we have fought over Palestine. What have we achieved? Nothing. If we had paused to think, we could have devised a plan, a strategy that can win us final victory."

Is a final and lasting peace settlement what the good doctor had in mind with his reference to a "final victory"? What about the sentiments of the Muslim leaders who responded to his speech with a standing ovation? Was it the drumbeats of peace that echoed on that day? I think not. From where does this loathing derive?



Dr. Mahathir Mohammad, former prime minister of Malaysia

The answer to the question may be found by investigating two Islamic principles: Dar al-Islam and infidels. From an Islamic perspective, the world is divided into two camps: dar al-Harab, lands not yet under Islamic rule; and dar al-Islam, lands where Islamic sharia (Muslim) law exists. Once under Islamic rule, land remains a part of dar al-Islam until Judgment Day. Thus, since the area formerly known as Palestine was once under Muslim control (634-1099 CE), it can never be relinquished.

The second confrontational Islamic teaching is the classification of people as either Muslim or infidel — the latter is further divided into "tolerated" (which includes Jews and Christians who are recognized by the prophet Muhammad as recipients of a divinely revealed scripture), and "not tolerated" (polytheists).

Jews and Christians are granted protection and tolerated under the widely misinterpreted dhimma treaty. The theological justification for the creation of this legal status stems from a Hadith (tradition relating to the prophet Muhammad), when in 628 CE, the Jewish tribe in Khaybar surrendered to Muhammad and his army under a dhimma treaty.

The infidel principle has existed since the time of Muhammad and has largely determined relations between Muslims and non-Muslims ever since.

In the words of renowned scholar and historian Amos Funkenstein, "[From a Muslim perspective], the world has to be politically 'secure' so that no Muslim is dominated by 'infidels.' And infidels, even if they are tolerated [Jews and Christians], are not to occupy positions of leadership in the dar el-Islam [dar al-Islam]." Muslims have an inherent interest in maintaining their socio-religious supremacy by denying equality to non-Muslims.

In the words of Algeria's first president, "Ce que nous voulons, nous autres Arabes, c'est être. Or, nous ne pourrons être que si l'autre n'est pas (What we want, as Arabs, is to be. However, we can only be, if the other is not)."

In view of these radical Islamic teachings, it should be no surprise that the Declaration of the State of Israel sent shockwaves all through the Muslim world.

With Palestine reverted to the Jews, a "vanquished people" had thrown off the yoke of Islam and declared statehood on land considered by Muslims to be an eternal part of dar al-Islam. As a result, Muslims were confronted with a theological dilemma to either revise exegetically inspired notions of Muslim supremacy, or to engage in a campaign against Jews in "occupied" Palestine, aimed at reuniting it (a "final victory") with the rest of dar al-Islam.

Unfortunately, the response of mainstream Islam to the creation of a non-Muslim state in Palestine has not been reform; instead, Muslims – spearheaded by Arabs – have engaged in a carefully calculated campaign against the Jewish state in an effort to put Muslims back in their "proper place" of advantage. Only when there is major reform of these fundamental Islamic doctrines can peace be achieved.

There are those, such as Egyptian-born political writer and academic, Tarek Heggy and other like-minded Muslims, who struggle for such reform. However, the real onus lies not on them, but on Muslim clerics who would have the task of maintaining the integrity of the Qur'an while reconciling it with modern notions of egalitarianism. More often than not, radical exegetes attack moderates whom they accuse of diluting Islam with secular ideas.

Until the mainstream Muslim world is ready to accept the equal treatment and rights of all human beings, we should not expect to see an end to the Arab-Israel conflict. In the meantime, Islamic intolerance should not be tolerated.

The Jewish link in the DNA chain

The death last month of Francis Crick has once again cast the spotlight on the fascinating story behind one of the most important breakthroughs in scientific history – the discovery of the molecular structure of DNA. While Crick's name, along with that of James Watson, will forever be linked with the unravelling of the DNA secret, the race that for them ended in triumph and a Nobel Prize, had, along the way, included other researchers of similarly high intellect and boundless drive.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Among them was a young woman named Rosalind Franklin. Born into an Anglo-Jewish family in 1920, Franklin could trace her paternal ancestry back to the 15th century, with a direct connection to the Imperial Rabbi of Prague. On her mother's side, her great-uncle was Viscount Herbert Samuel, the first British High Commissioner to Palestine.

Until well after she succumbed to ovarian cancer in 1958 at the age of 37, Franklin's name and her pivotal role in defining the structure of DNA went largely unheralded. The reasons are complex, with an undercurrent that graphically reflects the professional jealousies and apparent disdain for women that were ingrained in the scientific community of her day. Her biography, by Brenda Maddox, titled Rosalind Franklin: The Dark Lady of DNA (Harper Collins, 2002) is an inspiring read that explores her character in the context of her Jewish roots, her disciplined upbringing, and the various factors that brought her into frequent conflict with some of her co-workers.

It was, in fact, one of Franklin's associates, Maurice Wilkins, whose dislike for her may have paved the way for Watson and Crick's (and his own) success and reduced her to a mere footnote in the annals of scientific enquiry.

What Wilkins did was to show Watson the now-famous "Photo 51," the clearest X-ray diffraction image of DNA available at that time. The template, produced by Franklin, had the helical structure that gave Watson just the evidence he needed to fully construct his DNA model. Franklin was completely unaware of the subterfuge. And since she and Wilkins worked in London, while Watson and Crick were at a competing laboratory in Cambridge, the rationale for Wilkins' unusual action was, to say the least, highly suspect.

Such circumstances notwithstanding, it could still be reasonably argued that the real key to unravelling the elusive "code of life" lay as much in the generation of the helical image contained in Franklin's photograph as it did in Watson's interpretation of it. But whether Franklin's contribution would also have been recognized with a Nobel prize would never be known. Her premature death put an end to any such speculation.

Learning lessons from Machane Yehuda

To my mind, Jerusalem is a window onto Israel as a whole. All the country's woes and wonders, all its incompatibilities and inconsistencies, are packed, in miniature, into its capital: Arabs and Jews; East and West; Islam, Judaism and Christianity; modern and ancient; religious and secular – you name it. The good news is that in spite of (or, rather, in opposition to) the conventional TV view of the city, it actually works pretty well most of the time.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

One of my favourite corners of Jerusalem is the Jewish outdoor food market, Machane Yehuda. This colourful spectacle is the ultimate metaphor for where we're at as a people. A survey of the crowd teeming through its laneways on a typical Friday afternoon before Shabbat presents a fairly comprehensive taxonomy of our nation, with its long and varied Diaspora experience.

In this 21st-century manifestation of the biblical vision of the ingathering of the exiles, you'll find Sephardim and Ashkenazim speaking dozens of different languages, with shadings of skin from dark to light and theological positions from fervently anti-Zionist haredi to fervently Zionist secular – all of us, mingling freely and openly, sorting through the same heaps of tomatoes, potatoes, and onions.

Social and religious taboos speak against the nature of many casual interactions and associations that can be seen in the tight quarters of the market. But a simple and essential need common to everyone – feeding our families – fosters a sense of pragmatism and a level of tolerance that in other, less vital situations, might be rare, if not unthinkable.

Perhaps the most visually striking kinds of unintended encounters are when haredi men, traditional black garments and all, end up side-by-side, if not shoulder-to-shoulder, with young women, some of them scantily clad and sporting, not so rarely these days, rings in their lips or ears, and occasionally tattoos on their arms, legs or bellies.

A fastidiously pious individual, who for a full hour or more, if necessary, would remain standing on a city bus rather than sit beside a female soldier in slacks, might find himself, suddenly, in relatively intimate contact with one, and not infrequently with women of other religions and nationalities, too. Strict behavioural guidelines compiled over long centuries in the benign isolation of religious study halls often fail the test of real life in the streets of modern Israel.

There are numerous indications – some directly related to the trials and tribulations of recent times – that, despite manifold internal differences as a Jewish society (not to mention as a society of all of its citizens, whatever their national, religious or ethnic affiliations), we are drawing closer together. Mutual dependence is a powerful inducement for bringing down what are otherwise clearly demarcated social and religious boundaries. Our desperate situation, alas, has driven us deeper into one another's embrace.

At the grisly scenes after bombings, several praiseworthy haredi volunteer associations are often the first to arrive, tending without bias or hesitation to the victims – all the victims, be they female, male, Arab, Jewish, observant or atheist. In overcrowded hospital wards, saving lives and the relief of suffering, not one's headwear, are the only criteria in dispensing treatment. All other mores, credos, principles and beliefs take a back seat to our universal need to pull through these dark ages intact as a society. We Jews have learned once again that, when selecting targets, blind hatred does not make distinctions between our various theological positions.

Like Machane Yehuda, all of Israel is but a tiny, crowded place of astonishing complexity where discordance abounds and social harmony is at a premium. The squabbling will most surely persist, the bitter recriminations and slanderous insults continue to be traded, for years to come.

But it begins with things as simple and straightforward as shopping and dying together in one thin little strip of land. Slowly, the idea will begin to take root that we are all in the same inescapable fix called modern Jewish statehood.

Remaining separate and apart in ghettos was OK for preserving who we were in other people's countries, but it's not so good for shaping who we must be if we are to last in a country of our very own.

Advice to Paul Martin: forget the myths

Even before Prime Minister Paul Martin's new ministers could find their seats, self-proclaimed Middle East experts were giving them unsolicited advice.

Most agreed that under Martin's predecessor, Jean Chrétién, Canada lost influence on the Arab-Israeli conflict and that its policies were ineffective. Canadian officials supervised meetings on the refugee issue and poured money into UNRWA (United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees), while ignoring evidence that Palestinian Authority President Arafat had no interest in a peaceful solution. In United Nations speeches, Canada condemned violence and supported democracy, but in the votes, these principles were forgotten. Hobnobbing with their European and Arab peers, many Canadians took the expedient anti-U.S. and anti-Israel route.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For Martin and his new foreign minister, Pierre Pettigrew, the need for a new approach to Israeli-Arab issues should be obvious. Indeed, early on, the new government took a small step away from Europe when it abstained on the UN General Assembly vote endorsing the International Court of Justice's farcical "advisory opinion" on Israel's anti-terror barrier. A "no" vote would have been principled, but the abstention was a step in the right direction.

Looking forward, the new government has an opportunity to reconsider the myths of Canada's Middle East policy, as well as the influence of the people who promote them. A case in point is provided by Michael Bell, a former senior Canadian diplomat in the Middle East who has joined the University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Affairs.

Bell probably has good intentions, but his analyses, as published by the Canadian Institute for International Affairs and in newspapers columns, show that he doesn't get it. For Bell and his peers, Palestinians are helpless victims while Israel is the "stronger" and perennially guilty party. Their distorted map of the Mideast conflict excludes Hezbollah bases in Lebanon, Iran's nuclear weapons program, and the war still being waged against Israel from Algeria to Syria and Saudi Arabia.

Similarly, Bell filters Israeli responses to bus bombings through politically correct stereotypes (labelling it the "iron-fist approach"), and he refers to Israel's security barrier as a "land grab" and "contrary to international law." This mythology also confuses symptoms of the conflict, such as "settlements," "occupation" and refugees, with the core disease – Arab rejectionism – which Bell ignores.

This line of thinking also patronizingly excuses decades of Palestinian rejectionism and terror as "unavoidable," as if only Israelis leaders are capable of selecting historic compromise over unending confrontation. Bell refers to "communal warfare" (a euphemism for terror and a military invasion) that "broke out" in 1947 and in September 2000, thereby obscuring deliberate choices made by Arab leaders.

Beyond the particulars, Bell's thinking highlights the dangers of "balance" that dominate the approach of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. Although DFAIT officials claim to be "fair-minded" and "principled," the reality is that Canadian policy has been governed by an immoral "balance," in which the distinction between terrorists and victims is lost. Such artificial balance also erases the uniqueness of Israeli democracy in a neighbourhood dominated by military dictatorships and corrupt royal families.

Instead of more of the same, Martin and his team have a chance to use Canada's relative advantage – a reputation for morality – to positive effect in the Arab-Israeli conflict. It's time to end the habit of Canada's diplomats, including Bell, of downplaying incitement and hate speech in the Palestinian, Arab and Iranian media, and the brutality that it encourages. Similarly, Canadian officials have yet to explain their contributions to the disastrous 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa ("A conference against racism that was exploited to promote racism against Israel and the Jewish people," as Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler has noted). Without such an accounting, Canadian diplomats will not have the credibility to preach morality to others.

In particular, Martin's new government and the Middle East would be well-served by a policy that focuses on educating Palestinian and Arab children to reject violence and hatred. Serious "permanent status agreements" and an end to the conflict are still decades away, and clinging to tired myths will not change this.

The Kirshner File

Spectre of Muslim anti-Semitism haunts Europe

In a recent diplomatic tempest in a teapot, Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, triggered an international incident when he urged French Jews to emigrate.

Sharon, referring to the upsurge of anti-Semitic attacks in France since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000, declared: "If I had to advise our brothers in France, I'll tell them one thing: Move to Israel, as soon as possible."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Sharon's appeal for aliyah, while strictly in conformity with boilerplate Zionist rhetoric, touched a raw nerve in Paris. French President Jacques Chirac demanded an official explanation and let it be known that Sharon would not be welcome to visit France – the first modern European state to emancipate Jews but also the country where Vichy authorities sent 75,000 Jews to their deaths during the Holocaust.

The furor sparked by Sharon's call to aliyah dented Israel's relations with France, but it soon passed. In retrospect, the brouhaha was symptomatic of a new, disturbing phenomenon that has taken hold in France and parts of western Europe.

Until quite recently, anti-Semitic violence was perpetrated virtually exclusively by white European Christian radicals. But in the past four years, there has been a sea change, judging by a report on anti-Semitism issued by the European Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia in the autumn of 2003.

Commissioned by the European Union in 2002, following the bombing of a Jewish school near Paris, the report concluded that disaffected Muslim youths of North African extraction were behind many of the anti-Jewish assaults on synagogues, institutions, schools, cemeteries and shops under examination.

To be sure, as the European Union Monitoring Centre on Racism and Xenophobia noted in a subsequent report released four months ago, white neo-Nazis continue to play a major role in anti-Semitic incidents. And far right-wing political parties, such as Jean Marie Le Pen's National Front, pander to racism and have belittled the Nazi gas chambers as a "minor detail."

Nevertheless, it's clear that Muslim extremists, influenced by radical Islam, anti-Zionism, the intifadah and their marginal place in society, have informally joined Christian neo-Nazis in attacking Jews.

Muslims have expressed rage against Jews not only on the street, but via the Internet and Arab language media and audiotapes often culled from inflammatory sermons delivered by imams in mosques.

The new spectre haunting Europe feeds on its burgeoning Muslim population, estimated to be 20 million, compared to some 1.7 million Jews.

As of last year, Muslims comprised approximately five per cent of the European Union's population. But if current trends in birth rates and immigration persist, that figure could reach 10 per cent by 2020. And if that happens, Muslims will probably wield increasing influence in such diverse fields as foreign and social policy, perhaps to the detriment of Israel and local Jewish populations.

The countries with the highest concentrations of Muslims are France (five million vs. 600,000 Jews), Germany (3.5 million v.s 100,-000 Jews) and Britain (2 million vs. 250,000 to 300,000 Jews).

In France, the vast majority of Muslims hail from Algeria, a former colony that gained its independence in 1962 after 132 years of French imperial rule. But of late, Muslims from Morocco and Tunisia – which were also colonized by France – have migrated to France. Today, Muslim concentrations are found in Paris, Marseilles, Lyons and Lille.

Germany's Muslim community is made up primarily of Turks who were encouraged to come as so-called guest workers and essentially never left. They live in such cities as Frankfurt, Munich, Berlin and Hamburg. Like their Muslim counterparts in France, the Turks of Germany have formed a close-knit network of communal organizations radiating from the mosque.

The earliest migration of Muslims to Britain was from Yemen in the mid-19th century. But in the past three or four decades, Muslims have been immigrating to Britain from three southern Asian nations – Pakistan, India and Bangladesh – and have settled mainly in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Radford and Glasgow.

In all these countries, Muslims have generally established themselves as law-abiding, hard-working, productive citizens. But a handful of malcontents have sullied the image of these peaceful communities, particularly in France and Britain, because of their connections with militant Islam and anti-Semitism.

According to France's interior ministry, incidents of anti-Semitic violence shot up by nearly 60 per cent in the first three months of 2004. Lately, vandals have desecrated Jewish cemeteries in Lyon and Herrlisheim and smeared a shul with neo-Nazi graffiti in Valenciennes. In June, in a Paris suburb, a young man of North African origin, shouting "God is great!" in Arabic, stabbed a 17-year-old Jewish teenager wearing a kippah.

As a result of these incidents, the Jewish community is gripped by a sense of insecurity, if not outright fear, a fact Sharon alluded to in his controversial remarks.

French officials, from Chirac and Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin on down, have condemned these attacks and promised a more vigorous response to anti-Semitism.

At the same time, the government has taken steps to rein in Muslim extremists and promote tolerance and assimilation.

- France has created a national advisory council to encourage the emergence of a moderate strain of Islam.
- France has cracked down on Muslims associated with banned groups such as Al Qaeda. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist atrocities in the United States, which galvanized some Islamic fundamentalists, France has expelled dozens of Islamists, including fanatical clerics, who have preached jihad and hatred of "infidels" and who have voiced opinions at odds with the secular and democratic principles of the republic.
- France has also passed a bill, set to take effect next month with the start of the new academic year, banning conspicuous religious symbols – veils, crosses and kippot – in state schools.

Jacques Chirac

Britain, meanwhile, has been rocked by a rash of racist incidents, none of which bode well for relations between Jews and Muslims or reflect brilliantly on Islam, the world's fastest growing religion.

Two years ago, an East Ham Muslim affiliated with the radical Al Muhajiroun movement, was convicted of stirring up racial hatred by distributing leaflets calling on Muslims to kill Jews.

This year, a Muslim man from Edmonton was charged with making threatening and abusive phone calls to shuls in London.

The brother and sister of Omar Sharif, the first non-Arab suicide bomber to infiltrate Israel, currently face charges of failing to disclose information about his plan to attack Mike's Place in Tel Aviv, a bombing that claimed three lives in 2002.

Sir Sigmund Sternberg, one of Britain's leading interfaith activists, recently withdrew an award to Iqbal Sacranie, the newly elected secretary-general of the Muslim Council of Britain, after learning he had accused Israel of "ethnic cleansing." Sternberg described his statement as inimical to dialogue.

Sacranie, who charged Israel with engaging in a "calculated and deliberate" campaign of "creeping genocide" against the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, recently attended a ceremony marking the opening of London's largest Muslim community centre. The guest speaker, a Saudi sheikh named Abdur-Rahman al-Sudais, was a known fanatic. In a fiery sermon in Mecca prior to his London engagement, he denounced Jews as "the scum of the human race, the rats of the world, the murderers of the Prophets and the offspring of apes and pigs."

Having been apprised of al-Sudais' ideology, Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of Britain, cancelled a planned appearance at the centre. But Sacranie saw no reason to pull out or to demand a replacement for al-Sudais.

Since then, the waters have been further muddied by accusations from Al Muhajiroun that Britain's "Jewish lobby" influenced the arrest of Abu Hamza al-Masri, a British citizen of Egyptian background who faces extradition to the United States on charges of terrorism.

Al-Masri, whose sermons at London's Finsbury Park Mosque were filled with invective, had a coterie of admirers ranging from Richard Reid, the shoe bomber, to Zacarias Moussaui, an alleged Sept. 11 plotter.

At a recent House of Commons debate on anti-Semitism, Fiona Mactaggart, a Home Office minister, pledged to keep a close eye on Muslim extremists in Britain like Al-Masri.

In light of a warning by Hebrew University historian Robert Wistrich that "a cascade of hate" against Jews is pouring out from the Muslim world, all European states have a duty and an obligation to exercise vigilance.

Office equipment supplier pushes sale of Israel Bonds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Toronto office equipment supplier has hit on an idea that stretches Israel Bonds' double mitzvah program into a triple play.

Under a scheme being advanced by Motek and Gregory Konopny of Office Supercentre, their company will set aside five per cent of its sales for the purchase of Israel Bonds that their customers can donate to charities of their choice, and for which they then receive a tax deduction.

The idea, which was launched in October 2003, builds on Israel Bonds' double mitzvah program, which sees investors purchase Israel Bonds, thereby helping Israel, and donating the financial instruments to charities in lieu of a cash donation, said Motek Konopny, the company president.

Their plan will see the same two mitzvahs achieved, while adding the feature of making it automatic with the purchase of office equipment, he said.

> '... people feel the need to promote issues that matter to them'

"It's tremendous added value for clients who sign up to the benefits program," said Gregory Konopny, Supercentre's CEO.

"In these days of ethical business, people feel the need to promote issues that matter to them. Our clients are no different. Many of them already support a number of worthy causes. This benefits program enhances their charitable good-works," said Motek Konopny. "Best of all, it doesn't cost our clients a penny to give more to what they believe in."

He said the idea of linking Israel Bonds, charitable donations and the purchase of office supplies has boosted Supercentre's top line substantially.

Sales have increased by 30 per cent in the privately held company in less than a year. Given the modest size of the company compared to giant competitors such as Grand & Toy, the program has had a "great impact," he said.

Most companies taking advantage of the program are controlled by Jewish businesspeople, he continued, with about half the charities benefiting also Jewish. The United Jewish Appeal, the Jewish National Fund, Mount Sinai Hospital, the Baycrest Centre, Netivot Jewish day school, CHAT, Eitz Chaim and the Hospital for Sick Children are among the recipients of Israel Bonds. Charitable benefactors, who of course are also Supercentre customers, include RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust, Oakdale Golf & Country Club and Atlantic Packaging, as well as a number of real estate developers.

Edward Sonshine, president and CEO of RioCan, said he instructed his office manager to give Supercentre some business and has been happy with the result. In terms of cost and service, Supercentre has delivered, while there is "the additional attraction of the five per cent of sales that get donated to the charity of choice.

"I think it's great... If it works out right, it's a win, win, win situation."

Sonshine, who serves as chair of Israel Bonds of Canada, said he has directed RioCan's donation to the Baycrest Centre, where his wife, Fran, is chair.

Elan Levitan, manager of marketing for Israel Bonds, said in terms of public relations the Konopnys' idea has been quite successful, with dozens of businesses directing bonds to their favourite charities.

While it is too early to quantify the impact on overall bond sales, Levitan hopes "it will be a neat way to remind business leaders of the value of tzedakah (charity) and that Israel Bonds can be used for charitable giving.

"It's definitely precedent-setting in a self-generating way by doing things one would normally do to run a business."

The line between criticism and anti-Semitism

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Brian Bethune's "The New Old Hatred," in the Aug. 2 edition of Macleans, is a timely overview of the dangerous rise of anti-Semitism disguised as anti-Zionism, which Bethune, a senior staff writer, calls "a new mutation in the old prejudice."

Bethune alludes to the fact that some critics say their legitimate criticism of Israel is often denounced as anti-Semitic as a means of silencing valid discussion. He appropriately rejects this complaint. Bethune writes that "it's relatively easy" to distinguish legitimate criticism of Israeli government policies from illegitimate attacks, including most anti-Zionism – the denial of Jewish national liberation. "Even ardent Zionists, supporters of a Jewish state in the Mideast, can disagree with the policies of current [Israeli] Prime Minister Ariel Sharon," Bethune writes.

But a line is crossed, he says, "by the fact that crazed Jew-haters and anti-Sharon forces often use the same metaphors, drawn from the same deep-pool of ancient twisted imagery." For example, Bethune cites a 2002 editorial cartoon in the Italian newspaper La Stampa that showed a baby Jesus facing an Israeli tank and pleading, "Surely they are not going to kill me again?"

The left-leaning British magazine New Statesman ran a similar cover story, "A dangerous time to be a Jew," by Simon Sebag Montefiore, on June 28. Montefiore makes many of the same points as Bethune, although in a more urgent manner, given the more tenuous situation of European Jewry.

Writes Montefiore: "For more than a decade now, Israel has been the fashionable bête noire of the chattering classes. The response to Israel in the European media, particularly the BBC and The Guardian, has long been prejudiced, disproportionate, vicious [and] often fictitious.

"A typical case of the media's mendacity on Israel was the invented coverage of the Jenin 'massacre' [in April, 2002]… by British news organizations, which were so anti-Israel that they popularized an event that they could not have witnessed, because it had not happened."

He adds later that "in the British media, every Israeli sin is amplified, while those of the Arab world are ignored. The million dead of the Iran-Iraq war, Saddam Hussein's 300,000 victims, thousands more massacred in Chechnya, the Arab militias killing black Sudanese, the torturing Middle East tyrants are ignored… Our media conceal the venom directed at Israel by Arab clerics, television and the Internet, presenting Israeli complaints as propaganda."

Montefiore also makes the crucial distinction between legitimate criticism of Israeli policies and anti-Semitism: "It is not anti-Semitic to criticize Israel. Many of its policies are clumsy, self-defeating, wrong… If criticisms against Israel were based purely on its political faults, no one could complain. Yet, since the first intifada, Israel's critics [have used] hysteria and unreality, holding Israel to standards to which Britain, for one, could never aspire."

Montefiore's piece provides a fitting reply to the notorious, undeniably anti-Semitic cover that the New Statesman ran on Jan. 14, 2002. The cover illustration – with the caption "A kosher conspiracy?" – depicted a Star of David piercing the cross of the Union Jack. Following widespread protests, the magazine's editor, Peter Wilby, apologized for the cover, saying: "[T]he New Statesman is vigorously opposed to racism in all its forms. But it used images and words in such a way as to create unwittingly the impression that the New Statesman was following an anti-Semitic tradition that sees Jews as a conspiracy piercing the heart of the nation." Still, Wilby did not apologize for the accompanying story, which purported to investigate "the power wielded by the Zionist lobby."

It would be encouraging to believe that articles such as Bethune's and Montefiore's have resonated in media circles that have been preoccupied with Israel to the detriment of coverage of more urgent global events. But perhaps it is merely coincidental that traditional offenders, such as the BBC, have recently been paying more attention to events in Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan, Sudan and other hot spots around the world.

Proportionality – keeping things in perspective – is the key.

ISRAEL MYTH & REALITY: The Israel Myth and Reality program took place last month. Twenty-one Jewish day-school educators participated in the summer study program, which was sponsored jointly by the UJA Federation, the Jewish Agency for Israel, Partnership 2000 and the Jewish National Fund (JNF). Each of the co-sponsors focused on a different aspect of what comprises the Israel of 2004 and worked closely with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) to produce the program. The Jewish Agency portion, which centred on Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, examined Israel's historical and cultural legacy and the birth of the modern state at Tel Aviv's Independence Hall on May 14, 1948. Partnership 2000, which links Jewish communities in the Diaspora with those in Israel, allowed some participants to work with disadvantaged Eilat youth. Combining appreciation of both the land and its peoples, the JNF portion of the trip included a visit to Ilan Ramon's grave, a mini-lecture on the Druze community and a visit to the beautiful Lake Agmon Nature Reserve in the Galil's Hula Valley. Most of the participants in the program are general studies teachers from 10 day schools affiliated with the BJE.

Media assistant at Stratford Festival loves her job

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Shira Ginsler loves that her job is different every day.

As the media assistant for the Stratford Festival of Canada, Ginsler, 25, spends her time writing press releases, collecting and editing artists' biographies, setting up media interviews for actors, taking photographs and pitching story ideas to newspapers.

She said her job is "cyclical to the theatre schedule," which runs from April to November, but she works all year long.

Ginsler, who was born in Toronto and grew up in Kitchener, studied cultural management at the University of Waterloo.

During her last semester at Waterloo, a guest speaker from the Stratford Festival came to talk to the students in her arts-writing course. The speaker gave Ginsler's teacher a job description for a four-month summer position with the festival.

Ginsler applied, got the job and started work. While she was there, another employee unexpectedly decided to leave. At the end of the summer, Ginsler was hired to stay on full time.

Now, she has been a media assistant for the Stratford Festival for two years.

Ginsler said her friends and family are "thrilled and impressed" with her job. "My family thinks it's great. My grandmother and parents love to come to Stratford."

In high school, Ginsler was in a specialized arts program and "did a lot of performing" in plays, she said.

Once she decided to get involved in the behind-the-scenes aspect of theatre, and began planning and organizing productions, she realized that her days of acting were over.

"I really enjoyed [what I was doing]," she said. "I was getting better and better at it."

A friend of Ginsler's suggested she pursue a career in arts administration, a field Ginsler was unaware of. "I had no idea there was such a thing," she said.

Ginsler said being young doesn't get in the way of doing her job, but does sometimes make it difficult, and a bit lonely, for her to live in Stratford. "There aren't many people that work here in Stratford who are my age," she said.

Despite that, Ginsler said she is happy at work and, at the moment, "can't imagine leaving. I guess I'll be here until it's time to move on.

"I love being part of the Stratford Festival. I [used to] come with my family and with school every year. It's really nice to be part of something I was already familiar with and admire so much."

Ginsler said there is no Jewish community in Stratford, but there are other Jews at the festival, mostly in the acting company. "Being Jewish in Stratford just means that you go elsewhere to practise Judaism.

"I go back to Kitchener for holidays. I don't know what it would be like to grow up Jewish here, but most of the people at the festival grew up in larger places and have met Jews before, so I don't get strange questions or funny looks."

Ginsler begins each workday by clipping articles from the local daily newspaper, the Stratford Beacon Herald, as well as from the London Free Press, the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail.

"Then I go all over the place and talk to different people about different things. I co-ordinate," she said.

"Yesterday, before the matinee, I was out with the digital camera taking pictures of the 'fanfare' musicians for one of the newsletters."

Instead of turning lights off and on, to indicate to the audience that intermission is over, Ginsler said, fanfare musicians blow their trumpets at the Festival Theatre, one of Stratford's three theatres.

Ginsler said in the future she would like to work for a symphony orchestra, or an opera or dance company. "I'd love to try different things."

When Ginsler studied arts administration at school, she said the focus of her program was on fundraising, not on media relations.

"I'm learning this as I go along," she said. "At first, it certainly was [challenging], but eventually I got the hang of it."

Shira Ginsler, 25, the media assistant for the Stratford Festival of Canada, says that being Jewish in Stratford means that "you go elsewhere to practise Judaism," as Stratford doesn't have a Jewish community.

Jewish Life

Ours is definitely to question why

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Recently, a friend of mine spoke to me after Shabbat morning services about a problem he was encountering. He was taking a Jewish studies class, and each time he would ask a question concerning the meaning behind a commandment or why we Jews conduct ourselves in a certain fashion or do things in a certain way, the instructor, a very observant man, would avoid the question. He would say something to the effect that a Jew should not pose such queries or that it is more important to observe the mitzvot than to understand the reasons behind them.

Rabbinic Reflections

These responses did not satisfy my friend. He told me he could not believe that we are not permitted to utilize the innate sense of reason bestowed upon human beings by our Creator to try to understand and explicate His commandments. I encouraged my friend in his search. I told him he was following in the footsteps of a great Jewish leader and scholar, Moses Maimonides.

Here are the words of Maimonides, as found in the Guide for the Perplexed (3, 31): "There is a group of human beings who consider it a grievous thing that causes should be given for any law; what would please them most is that the intellect would not find a meaning for the commandments and prohibitions... For they think that if those laws were useful in this existence and had been given to us for this or that reason, it would be as if they derived from the reflection and the understanding of some intelligent being. If, however, there is a thing for which the intellect could not find any meaning at all and that does not lead to something useful, it indubitably derives from God; for the reflection of man would not lead to such a thing. It is as if... man were more perfect than his Maker; for man speaks and acts in a manner that leads to some intended end, whereas the deity does not act thus, but commands us to do things that are not useful to us... But He is far exalted above this; the contrary is the case – the whole purpose consisting in what is useful for us."

Maimonides declares his view on this topic even more clearly in his great work on Jewish law, the Mishneh Torah. In it, he directs his readers to "seek out the reasons for all the commandments" (Laws of Trespass, VIII,8). Maimonides cautions his readers that all of the laws are to be obeyed, even if we fail to understand or rationalize them. Nonetheless, it is incumbent upon us, Maimonides states, to attempt to penetrate to the essence and real motives of the laws of the Torah. I would add, and I believe Maimonides would agree, that it is also possible that the more we learn about the world and its inhabitants, the more likely it is that we may achieve a new and broader understanding of the commandments and their meaning for us today.

Maimonides makes another very cogent point. He maintained that by discovering the reasons for the commandments, we discover the universal foundations that underlie them. The other peoples of the world can learn to appreciate the wisdom of the Torah and thus the name of God becomes sanctified in the world. When we show that the laws and statutes have rational significance, we cause the name of God to be sanctified and draw positive appreciation of our Torah from the entire world.

Bernard Baskin

This summer, Isaac Bashevis Singer, who died in 1991, would have celebrated his 100th birthday. These three volumes of his collected short stories, as well as a number of special events in his honour across North America, mark the occasion.

Singer arrived in the United States from Poland in 1939 and began a writing career of prodigious energy and output that led to widespread acclaim and readership and the Nobel Prize for literature in 1978. It was the first time, and undoubtedly the last time, that the award would be presented to a Yiddish writer.

In his Nobel lecture before an august audience, Singer asserted: "People are asking me often, why do you write in a dying language? And I want to explain it in a few words. First, I like to write ghost stories, and nothing fits a ghost better than a dying language. The deader the language, the more alive is the ghost. Ghosts love Yiddish; they all speak it.

"Secondly, I believe in resurrection. I'm sure that the Messiah will soon come, and millions of Yiddish-speaking corpses will rise from their graves on that day, and their first question will be, 'Is there any new Yiddish book to read?'"

One aspect of Singer's work that has aroused both unusual interest, as well as dispraise, is the realm of the occult or the supernatural.

In one of his stories, a rich stranger, who showers the poor town of Frampol with fine foods, gorgeous clothes and gold, turns out to be Ketev Mriri, chief of the devils; and the entire town is burned to the ground as werewolves, imps, demons and hobgoblins descend from the sky. Strange creatures appear from nowhere; people are possessed or corrupted by demons.

It is no wonder that Singer's volumes of children's stories are so successful. He infuses the familiar fairy-tale motifs with the folklore of eastern European Jewry. There are all the supernatural elements: dream castles with silver roofs and crystal towers; golden lockets; pieces of chalk with magical powers; and spicy rolls mixed with powerful poison, but Singer gives it all a distinctly Jewish flavour. When good triumphs over evil, it is usually with the help of the Kabbalah.

Asked about his reliance on folklore, Singer said, "If you walk in the street, you know that you are not invisible, you are going to be seen. If you have no wings, you know you cannot fly. But folklore gives you wings, give you the little cap that makes you invisible, gives you little boots, so you can walk seven miles in a second. This appeals immensely to our human emotions. Folklore doesn't give a hoot about the mind. It works only for your feelings. And this to me is the essence of art... In my case I use Yiddish folklore – the folklore I heard in the house where I grew up."

A recent editorial in the Jewish Forward – the newspaper in which almost all of Singer's writings were first published – commented on the anniversary with these words: "The world of prewar eastern European Jewry is fading from living memory into history. When the last survivors have gone, the memories will live more vividly because of Singer. He may not have been the most accurate portraitist, or the most popular among his peers and subjects, but he is the one who has left the stamp on the wide world for all of them. Time and dictators leave a mark on the world, but writers – including Singer – will have the last word. For this, we honour them."

Bar/bat mitzvahs for special needs kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

At the best of times, planning a bar or bat mitzvah is a time of joy – and stress – for everyone involved. But if the child preparing for the big day also has special needs, it can make the celebration daunting – and for some families, impossible.

Today, I would like you to meet some amazing young people, who along with their dedicated families, found ways to celebrate their Jewish coming of age.

In A Bat Mitzvah for Jenny, Marlena Thompson tells of the challenges of being the mother of an autistic daughter – while coping with a system that only made things harder for them. Thompson realized having a standard ceremony with Jenny being called up to the Torah would have little meaning for her daughter. She felt it would be more appropriate to celebrate during the havdalah ceremony marking the end of the Sabbath. The light of the candle, the taste of the wine, the aroma of the spices would be just right to inspire Jenny. But when their rabbi refused to be part of the unconventional ceremony, Thompson planned it herself in a local hotel.

"Gazing at my daughter's lovely face, luminous with the joy of achievement, and hearing her remark, 'Being Jewish smells like oranges and cinnamon,' I had no doubt that [the prophet] Elijah had indeed made his way to our self-styled sanctuary. His presence would be a fitting tribute to the sanctity of innocence and my unwavering belief that, differences and disabilities notwithstanding, God simply does not make mistakes." [www.beliefnet.com/story/47/story_4772_1.html]

For more stories about special children and their special families, go to the Council for Jews with Special Needs website. [www.cjsn.org/articles.shtml]

One of the heroes in developing programs for children with special needs is Judith Edelman-Green. Edelman-Green is director of Israel's Bar/Bat Mitzvah for the Special Child program. [www.jrep.com/Israel/Article-45.html] Established in 1995, the program has helped more than 1,500 children youngsters celebrate their special day. The program is run by Israel's Masorti (Conservative) Movement but children from all backgrounds are welcome. Edelman-Green says, "Although a child may be limited physically or mentally, he or she need not be limited spiritually." [www.masorti.org.il/mason/have/bm_special.html]

Leslie Kessler feels parents should consider an important question before they embark on the challenge of preparing a child with special needs for a bar or bat mitzvah. The speech therapist says families need to ask themselves whether this is "'what's best for the child, or do I really want this for me?' because many of these children can't tell you if they don't want this. Parents need to take a very careful inventory of their child's abilities." [http://tinyurl.com/6p782]

Becca Hornstein planned a bar mitzvah for a son with autism. She is also executive director of the Council for Jews with Special Needs, in Phoenix, Ariz., and has advice for families who want to modify the ceremony to match the strengths and limitations of their children: [http://tinyurl.com/4nnuw]

• Child cannot learn to read Hebrew: Write the "script" in transliteration (phonetic English) or prepare an audiotape with all the prayers in Hebrew in English.

• Child cannot verbalize: A boy who was profoundly multiply disabled and had absolutely no communications skills "sat on his father's lap, his fingers lovingly curled around the wooden handles of the scroll, as his father chanted the Hebrew in his son's honour."

• Child cannot stay in one place for long: Hornstein tells the story of one hyperactive boy's bar mitzvah. Knowing that he might wander during the Shabbat service, the rabbi said, "Today is Ben's day. The entire chapel is his bimah, and he can move in it as he wishes [to] communicate with God in his way. [http://ici.umn.edu/products/impact/143/over09.html]

Speaking of doing things a bit differently, sometimes the right timing – and location – for the ceremony can make all the difference in the world. When Brian David was called to the Torah to celebrate his bar mitzvah, "on hand were Brian's parents, two sisters, brother and family friends, as well as almost 600 of his closest friends – the campers and staff of Camp Ramah in Canada." At 21 years of age with Down syndrome, Brian was also a veteran of the camp's tikvah program for children with special needs. When Brian was 13, his parents had decided to forgo a formal ceremony, "but now that he had a community of his own, with a congregation that welcomes him just as he is, we decided to have a bar mitzvah where Brian is both loved and respected." [www.campramah.org/news/Brians_Song.html]

Being there, with God

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

It's Friday night in the Nachlaot neighbourhood of Jerusalem, in – literally – an underground shul with the ambience of a bomb shelter. Here at Congregation Kol Rinah, Jewish spirituality is always tuned to a Carlebachian pitch, and the scene is almost surreal. Fervent men and women – ex-hippies, Bratslavers, New Agers, leftover Shlomo devotees, and assorted others, many of them dressed in pure white – stand wall to wall, and the singing is high-decibel. Men are dancing, and some are jumping up and down like headbangers in a mosh pit. Many are beaming, and a few are crying. A young blind man with a cane is shuffling around the bimah. The scene is almost Pentecostal in flavour, and nothing like the emotional restraint in the synagogues of my youth – and, alas, my adulthood. The service runs more than two hours. By the time I leave, I am sweating. And I am reminded of why I pray, especially as the High Holy Days approach.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Prayer, as Rabbi Abraham Heschel states, should be an attempt to ask ultimate questions and make contact with an ultimate source of being. To inhabit this "zone" of prayer, we must shift from the domain of "having" into "being."

"Having" is characterized by acquisitiveness. It is not simply about wanting material possessions, it's a craving that extends into vast range of different fields. We "have" people – husbands, wives, friends, children. We "have" knowledge, admiring our possession of information or know-how. We "possess" our bodies, our life, even our afterlife.

Religion, too, eventually falls into this realm of "having," for we organize our spiritual lives along similar lines. To push off our anxieties about the deepest existential questions – Why am I alive? What is the purpose of living? How do I confront my own mortality? – we surround ourselves with the realm of "having." A religion that cannot address these deepest questions is no more than a system of ritual. Prayer is designed to operate within the realm of "being," a realm that focuses entirely on asking meaningful questions and seeking out God. If prayer remains trapped inside of "having," it is as though it is imprisoned in a foreign place, and its effectiveness will be severely contained.

"Being" is life stripped of social constructions and reorganized according to its essential terms – mystery, awe, silence, wonder. Judaism, like other faith systems, is an organized response to mystery, and prayer is part of that response. "Being" is vertical. It dictates that life must be thought of as a process of asking and coming to terms with the questions noted above. Often in our society, anyone who dwells on such questions is regarded as "morbid" or "dreamy" and is assigned a place on the margins of life, in a niche carved out for eccentrics, philosophers and monks.

Ultimately the goal of the Torah, as Maimonides states, is an absolute preoccupation with the source of all things. Being is thus, in theological terms, the place where God lives.

It takes care and understanding to effectively teach kids with Special Needs. At Beth Tikvah, our program is second to none. Ask for it by name:

Israeli teens experience Toronto camp life

Partnership 2000 brings Eilat youth to Centre Camp

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Thanks to UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative, the Bathurst JCC's Centre Camp has a decidedly Israeli flavour this summer. P2K is designed to develop professional and personal connections between the people of Eilat/Eilot and Toronto.

For the first time in its 17 year history, P2K organizers recently hosted three youngsters from Toronto's twinned community of Eilat at the camp, where they took part in its Counselor-in-Training program. Their two-week visit wrapped up earlier this week.

While the three Eilat youths were officially considered campers, they were also involved in leadership workshops and training seminars at the camp.

For 15-year-olds Phillip Grace and Stav Orr, as well as Shirlee Levy, 16, who were accompanied by their chaperone, Ofra Boaron, their first sojourn to Canada was hardly a disappointment.

"There is nothing like this for us in Eilat. They have camps for younger kids, but nothing for children of our age," said Levy, who is involved in a number of youth groups in Eilat. "When they asked me if I wanted to go to Canada, I screamed 'yes, of course I do'! The environment in Toronto is so beautiful; it's so green, especially compared to Eilat. But it's also such a big city, about two-and-a-half million people. Eilat has only 60,000 people. It's very different, but also so beautiful."

While all three acknowledged that they quickly made friends with the Toronto campers, there was one noticeable and bittersweet difference between the two cultures.

"Maybe it's because we come from Israel, but I feel that we are older than the Toronto 15-year-olds," said Grace. "In Israel we need to grow up much faster than the kids do here. We have to get ready to go in the army in two or three years. We really don't have that much time just to have fun and be children. Life is obviously much harder in Israel than in Toronto."

For Kevin Knopman, Centre Camp's assistant director, the visit by the Israelis to the camp is part of a new mandate.

"At Centre Camp this year we've really tried to significantly expand our connection with our friends in Israel, and through this P2K initiative, we've really succeeded," said Knopman who recently visited Eilat and then found Canadian families willing to house the youngsters during their stay here. "As much as they've been influenced by our community, they have touched us as well. They are terrific ambassadors for Israel and we hope that when they return to Eilat, they'll be great ambassadors for Toronto and Centre Camp."

Ben Schneider 1912 - 2004

There are many types of people in the world and it takes a special character to be able work well with all of them.

Ben Schneider was such a man. Whether he was helping settle immigrants and refugees into the United States after World War II, soliciting funding for Jewish communal services, or planning a cemetery that would be all-inclusive, Ben knew how to bridge the gaps.

"One of the best things Ben brought to the community was his ability to work with a large range of leadership personalities," recalls Ben's longtime friend Jerome D. Diamond, a former executive director of Toronto's Jewish Family and Child Service. "You have very fussy people and you have people who use their community involvement to boost their status. Ben involved all orthodox schools instead of having every little shteibel do their own thing. Women had emerged as leaders in business and Ben was alert and sensitive to that. He had a shopping list of what a modern functioning Jewish communal system should look like and feel like, and he used his people skills to make it happen."

Ben, who died earlier this year at the age of 92, devoted his whole life to helping others. Born in New York City to what his son Kal describes as a "less than affluent family," Ben knew from an early age that he wanted to do for others and pursued a Masters of Social Work from Fordham University. While completing his education, Ben was assigned to work at New York's 125th Street office of the Department of Public Affairs. His boss was a woman named Mary Swit Diamond – Jerome's late first wife – and she instantly saw great potential in the young man from the Lower East Side.

"My wife had an entire white staff catering to the black community, so she wanted to encourage some of her black female clients to go back to school and qualify as social workers," says Jerome, who used to play handball with Ben at New York's 92nd Street Y. "Even though Ben already had a heavy caseload, he welcomed the opportunity to train these women."

Soon after, Ben took on a post at the United Service for New Americans in New York to help settle Jewish Holocaust survivors in the U.S., a step that would mark the beginning of his lifelong devotion to the Jewish community. There he was, trying to help people fit into American society when they had just lost their homes and their families in the cruelest of ways. He felt moved at every encounter and never forgot their pain.

Ben & Estelle Schneider

"That job really affected my father," says Kal. "He recognized that these were people in need. He had people sitting across from him who had only a duffel bag."

Ben took a number of positions at Jewish communal organizations in Boston, Miami and Cleveland, and in 1959, he became director of social planning for the United Jewish Welfare Fund (UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's predecessor organization). He later took over as director.

Ben was insistent that women take on leadership roles in the community and stand "side by side with men without any chochmas (arguments) about it," says Jerome. He became a tough-minded fundraiser and "absolutely relentless in setting fundraising goals and putting teams in place to deal with the issues." He believed that fundraising was a community affair and brought together all branches of Toronto Jewry to make it happen. His efforts paid off in the form of UJA Federation's endowment fund (now the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto) and the all-inclusive Pardes Shalom Cemetery.

"What impressed everybody was the absolute fairness in the way Ben set up the cemetery," says Jerome. "He designed a modern cemetery system with the reputation as being the best in North America. That's the kind of guy you're dealing with."

Still, Ben never let his public life take him away from his family. He was a loving father to Kal and his sister Margaret, taking them on day trips to the country or tobogganing in the park, teaching them to bike and skate, or shooting hoops with them on the driveway. And the avid golfer was completely devoted to his wife Estelle, who died four months before him after more than 60 years of marriage.

"My Dad was phenomenally smart," says Kal. "He was able to convince people that the right thing – his ideas – were their ideas and he didn't have an ego to get in the way. He was the kindest, gentlest person who did the job that had to be done and didn't need any recognition."

Margaret, a psychology professor in Toronto, says that growing up with an activist father made it a natural for her to involve herself in helping others, too.

"Dad was my role model in a really unobtrusive kind of way – by the way he lived, not by anything that he said," she says. "He never said to me, 'It's good to be an activist' or 'This is valuable work.' He just did his work and demonstrated through it some of the values he held, like the importance of community and the importance of activism and the importance of working for people who are less advantaged than we are. It just made it an integral part of my life. That's what you do."

Holocaust survivors prefer to live in Toronto

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

According to a recent study, the Greater Toronto Area is home to more than half of the 23,660 Holocaust survivors living in Canada.

The report, published by UJA Federation and UIA Federtations Canada, is based on data collected from the 2001 census, and was written by Charles Shahar, chief researcher, national demographic study on the Jewish population of Canada.

The report cites 12,815 Holocaust survivors living in the GTA, representing 54.2 per cent of Canada's survivor population, compared to 6,795 in Montreal, or 28.7 per cent.

"Toronto's large percentage of survivors can be traced to Toronto's influx of elderly Jews from other parts of Canada and other countries in the last several years," says Shahar.

"Many of these seniors may have wished to join younger family members already living in this metropolitan area," he notes. "It is likely that their numbers increased the total survivor population in Toronto, or at least made up for the losses experienced through attrition."

Holocaust survivor Michael Rosenberg, 78, a resident of Toronto since 1948 when he came to the city from Germany, says that Toronto was – and continues to be – the perfect setting for Holocaust survivors.

"The centrality of Jewish life, Jewish education, and Jewish organizations in Toronto made me, a survivor, feel welcome as a Jew immediately," he says. "Throughout the 56 years I have been here, I can honestly say that Toronto has been a city that because of its supportive Jewish community, has helped survivors of the Holocaust rebuild their shattered lives and, for this I can say, we are all truly grateful."

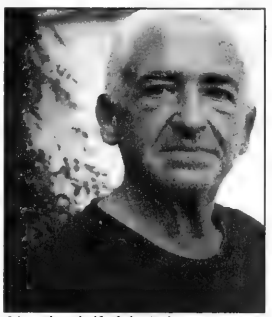
While Toronto has been good to Holocaust survivors, adds Rosenberg, the relationship has been beneficial to both sides.

"Holocaust survivors that I speak to through the UJA landsmanshaften (societies) know that it is their duty to support our community and to do whatever they can to foster Jewish education, and support Jewish identity, especially now, in light of the resurgence of anti-Semitism here and around the world."

A disturbing statistic uncovered by the study is that more than a quarter of Toronto's 20,000 Jewish poor are 65 years of age or older. Nearly 6,000 elderly people in the Jewish community live below the poverty line, which translates to one in five seniors.

"Seniors who live in poverty are an especially vulnerable group," says Shahar. "A gap in support services or an inability to access necessary supports can have a major impact on the lives of elderly persons who are economically disadvantaged."

According to Eric Kirsh, a social worker and supervisor of rehabilitation services for Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Service, the cost of housing is the biggest factor contributing to the economic woes of seniors.



More than half of the Holocaust survivors living in Canada reside in Toronto.

"Our seniors could definitely benefit from affordable housing – that's what eats up most of their limited incomes," he says. "Unfortunately, people who must ensure that they have a roof over their heads sometimes have to make trade-offs or sacrifices when it comes to other basic necessities."

Holocaust Centre acquires historical treasure

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto recently received a unique and priceless gift of 10 original lithographs, each depicting scenes from an important time in Jewish history.

The 10 original drawings – capturing images of life in the ghetto of Kovno – drawn by artist Esther Lurie, were recently presented to the centre's director, Professor Adam Fuerstenberg.

Despite the almost complete annihilation of Lithuanian Jewry during the Holocaust, Kovno – one of Lithuania's most prominent cities – is perhaps best known for its courageous acts of Jewish resistance. During the three years of internment in the ghetto, the Jews of Kovno – including Esther Lurie - also did what they could to secretly document their lives.

Born near Riga, Latvia in 1913, Lurie had returned to Europe from Palestine for further art study and was visiting her sister in Kovno when the Germans invaded in June 1941. The "Judenrat" (a Jewish council made up of former community leaders) in the Kovno Ghetto asked her, a photographer, and two lesser-known artists to record events in the ghetto. Lurie created over 400 watercolours and drawings, many of which survived, and among these are the 10 donated lithographs she created from rescued drawings. Some of the surviving works were first exhibited in Vienna in 1945 and in later exhibitions in Israel where the artist still lives.

The lithographs were donated by Anya Sorkin, whose mother, Sara Genaite, a professor of political economy at Vilnius University, was with her husband, Misha Rubinson, in the leadership of the Kovno Ghetto resistance and subsequently among the partisans in the area.

"Sara heard me speak during one of our Holocaust Centre events in Toronto, and she approached me after the event," says Fuerstenberg. "She said to me, 'I'm a survivor of the Kovno Ghetto and I have documents you might like. Would you be interested'? Would I be interested? Of course I was interested. Some months later we met again when her daughter Anya gave me these incredible works of art."

According to Fuerstenberg, the originals for these lithographs, which are in surprisingly good condition, were placed in ceramic jars before being hidden or buried in ruins and a cemetery in the ghetto.

"While I'm sure these drawings have a good monetary value, they are really quite priceless," says Fuerstenberg. "They are so unique because they are a very rare, first-hand artistic account of the people and of the horrors of life in the Kovno Ghetto. We plan to make these incredible images the centerpiece of an exhibit about survival and resistance in that ghetto."

Witnessing Dreams Fulfilled in Israel

By LESLIE GALES
Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

"In France, there is fear in the streets – the Jews are very afraid to travel by subway/trains, to walk in the streets at night, and even during the day."
--Stephen Amar, a recent immigrant from France to Israel

Unfortunately, Stephen's sentiments are not only accurate but also echoed by thousands of French Jews – many of whom, with our help have taken the courageous step of starting new lives in Israel.

Leslie Gales, Chair of the UJA Federation Board, with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in Tel Aviv, as they recently welcomed 200 new olim from France.

"There is no future for Jews in France," adds Stephen. "None at all." But there certainly is a bright future for French Jews in Israel. After visiting Paris in May to assess the unsettling scope of French anti-Semitism and to meet with worried Jews contemplating aliyah, I was privileged, only a few weeks ago, together with UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky, to see the circle completed.

There we were on the tarmac of Ben Gurion Airport, alongside Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, watching 200 ecstatic olim on a flight from Paris, realize their deepest dreams – a fresh start in Israel. It was a proud moment for the Jewish Agency, our overseas partner, responsible for aliyah for me for Ted and for the entire Jewish people. The Jewish Agency provided the plane, the logistics and the support, but it was the generosity of Jews everywhere, including Toronto, that rescued these well-educated, middle class olim from danger. Now we have to ensure both their successful absorption into Israeli life and the emigration of every French Jew who wants to leave.

Our visit to Israel was fulfilling in many other ways as well. Who would have thought, for example, that UJA Federation's donation of a fire engine to the Eilat Fire Brigade could be so meaningful? Before the arrival of this crucial vehicle, capable of reaching high-rise buildings, Eilat firefighters were forced to rely on a truck from Be'ersheva, more than 200 kilometres away. Now they'll be able to handle occurrences at Eilat's largest hotels. As an Israeli flag was hoisted high above the city, using the fire engine's giant ladder, it became clear that Toronto's gift was a huge source of pride for Eilat.

Toronto's remarkable relationship with Israel's most southern Eilat/Eilot region, through the Partnership 2000 (P2K) program, is based on special bonds of friendship and trust, from which our community and the Eilat/Eilot area are benefiting immeasurably. Now, what if we take our relationship an innovative step further by uniting UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Eilat/Eilot municipal administration, non-profit organizations, agencies and schools in an unprecedented partnership? The possibilities are only limited by our imaginations.

Some of the 200 new olim from France recently arrived to a great welcome at Tel Aviv's Ben Gurion Airport.

How the Holocaust rocked Rush's Geddy Lee

From Staracohwice, about an hour south of Warsaw, they, along with many members of both their families, were sent to Auschwitz. Eventually Weinrib was shipped to Dachau in southern Germany, and Rubenstein to Bergen-Belsen in northern Germany. Thirty-five thousand people died in Bergen-Belsen from starvation, disease, brutality and overwork, according to information from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. Another 10,000 people, too ill and weak to save, died during the first month after liberation.

Lee told his mother's story to band drummer and lyricist Neil Peart, and "Neil took that sentiment and wrote Red Sector A," says Lee.

For a song that's supposed to be set in some unstated, undated future, lyrics such as, "Ragged lines of ragged grey/Skeletons, they shuffle away/Shouting guards and smoking guns/Will cut down the unlucky ones," sound realistic and reportorial. Perhaps it is the music with its pounding drums, chilling guitar and ominous synthesizer that transport the listener to a yet-to-come time and place. But maybe it is simply easier for Lee to deal with this song as metaphor instead of family history.

His parents were interned in a labour camp

Lee was born Gary Lee Weinrib in Toronto on July 29, 1953. His parents had immigrated there in 1947 and opened a discount variety store. (They had reunited after the war and lived in the officers' quarters of Bergen-Belsen after it was turned into a displaced persons camp. They were also among 2,000 couples that married in the camp during the first few months after liberation.

Unlike many Holocaust survivors, Lee's parents did not bottle up or hide their experiences. Lee began hearing the horror stories as early as age eight. He remembers the stress and nightmares the stories triggered. "These were the things that happened to them during the most formative time in their lives. Some people go to horseback riding camp; my parents went to concentration camp," Lee says, trying to explain why stories of Holocaust brutality and cruelty were so common at home.

His parents gave their three children a Jewish education, and Lee had a bar mitzvah at 13. Unfortunately, his father died the year before from chronic health problems that took root in the camps. (Today, Lee considers himself a cultural Jew, and celebrates many Jewish holidays with his family, but does not believe in organized religion.)

His mother, like many Holocaust survivors who became parents, was overly protective of her children. During Lee's teens, which he describes as "a selfish time," he distanced himself from his parents' history, and also discovered rock 'n' roll. Singing in a rock band, Lee says, "was me yelling back" at authority.

It was well after Morris Weinrib died, that an aunt told Lee his father had played the balalaika at bar mitzvahs and weddings, but had purposely kept that fact from his children. "He didn't want us going into music as a career," Lee says, adding, "It was a great feeling to know he was musical."

Lee was 16 when he formed the first incarnation of Rush with guitarist Alex Lifeson and drummer John Rutsey in 1969. Current drummer and band lyricist Peart replaced Rutsey in 1974 after the release of the band's debut album, thus the 30th anniversary celebration now.

Rush became a musical force to be reckoned with after the release of the album 2112 in 1976, and has sold millions of albums and toured arenas and stadiums ever since. Often skewered by critics as bombastic, the band's appeal stems from stellar musicianship and songs that veer far afield from run-of-the-mill hard rock fare.

On Lee's 2000 solo album My Favourite Headache, he co-wrote Grace to Grace, another song dealing with his mother's wartime experience.

The song, Lee explains, is partially about his mother's courage, survival instincts, and "her ability to keep her head up" though all of the horror she lived through.

Lee's mother has been reminded of Hitler's Germany by a wave of anti-Semitism that included the April fire-bombing of a Jewish day school in Montreal. The rise in anti-Semitism in Canada, Lee says, "is upsetting to all of us. There is a large Jewish community in Toronto and many of them are Holocaust survivors. My mother is sensitive to any act of anti-Semitism anywhere in the world, not just Canada. There is no such thing in the homes of Holocaust survivors that, 'It can't happen here.' They always feel it can happen again. My mother never felt secure again."

Except for possibly one time.

In 1995, Lee, his older sister, and younger brother accompanied their mother back to Germany to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Bergen-Belsen. They met many other survivors as well as British Army veterans who had liberated the camp. Their mother also took them back to her hometown in Poland and the house in which she grew up.

"The Holocaust doesn't go away," Lee says. "My mother still has a tattoo on her arm, but that was a great trip for her, a completion of something. It made her feel fantastic to stand on those grounds with her children. For the first time she felt like a victor, like, 'I'm here and you're not!'"

Muslims threatened in Ryerson hate incidents

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

In Ryerson University's second hate incident of the summer, posters threatening death to Muslims that purported to be from Jewish groups were found on bulletin boards around the school.

The letter-sized flyers, one of which called on Toronto Jews to "fight back against Muslims and Arabs who wish to cause harm to us," were spotted earlier this month in prominent locations on campus by maintenance staff, said Ryerson spokesperson Dana Yates.

After the flyers appeared, the Muslim Students' Association found a letter in its campus mailbox threatening the group's president.

The Toronto Police hate crimes unit was called after the posters were discovered and are investigating both the flyers and the letter with campus security. The effort includes reviewing Ryerson security tapes in an effort to identify those responsible.

"We take these things, obviously, very seriously," Yates said.

As of last week, there were no suspects and it was unknown if the perpetrators were from Ryerson.

Police hate crimes unit called in after posters found

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the flyers were meant to "drive a wedge and create hostility" between Muslim and Jewish students.

"I don't think it's someone caught up in Middle East politics," he said. "I think it's someone caught up in racist politics."

A Jewish person in the Ryerson community who saw the posters sent copies to Farber, who said he then contacted the school to make sure it was "aware of this [hate crime] and to ensure the security of both Muslims and Jews."

In one poster, signed by a group calling itself the Full Blooded Israelis Brigades, Islam is referred to as "a disease that had made its way into the world and it must be eradicated."

The flyer continues, "We ask Jews everywhere in Toronto not to be fearful of the Muslim parasites. We ask that whenever you spot a Muslim no matter who it is, Man, Woman, Teenager, Black Muslim, that you beat them and cause harm to them. Kill these Islamic Infidels and don't be ashamed to be a Jew."

Yates said Ryerson already has a "strong presence of security on campus," but it will be increased.

University officials met with representatives of Congress and the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF), after which they released a joint statement condemning the flyers and threats.

"Those who seek to divide the Ryerson community will not succeed. This is clearly an attempt to provoke ill will within Ryerson University," Ryerson president Claude Lajeunesse said in the statement.

Farber told The CJN that "the purpose was to create a statement that we could all share, that would denounce the flyers and send a statement of comfort to students.

"No matter the differences between the groups, [the statements on the flyers] are criminal, uncivilized and un-Canadian."

Another poster, signed by a group calling itself The FBC Ridaz, took responsibility for a June 23 incident in which the words "Die Muslims Die" and Stars of David were spray-painted on the walls of the school's multifaith room.

In the flyer, the group writes that the reason for the June incident was to get "back at the Muslim faggots that vandalized Jewish property and wrote anti-Semitic graffiti." The flyer did not specify what vandalism it was speaking of, but it may have been referring to vandalism of cemeteries and Jewish property in Toronto and Vaughan last spring.

The flyer also warns Muslim students that "we will continue to send messages and that this incident is only the first of many. We want to let them know that no Muslim student will be safe and that security isn't going to stop us."

Yates said Muslim, Arab and Jewish students at Ryerson have "a long tradition of getting along."

Dave MacLean, president of the Ryerson Students' Administrative Council (RyeSAC), agreed.

"We've never had a problem like this on campus before," he said.

After the flyers were found, RyeSAC set up a meeting for various faith groups on campus to talk about them with a harassment discrimination officer and with campus security.

"Students discussed how they felt about it," said MacLean. "Everyone felt it wasn't people from their own faith group. It was someone maliciously trying to cause conflict on campus. We firmly believe it wasn't someone from Ryerson."

In response to the recent incidents, the university has organized two community information sessions for students, faculty and staff.

The purpose of the sessions is to "talk about what actions have been taken by the university, what [the Ryerson community] can do about it and to get tips from campus security," Yates said.

Leatrice Spevack, campus groups administrator, said speakers will include Lajeunesse or a school vice-president, as well as representatives from campus security, RyeSAC, CJC and the CAF.

Farber said Hillel will participate in the information sessions to "look for ways to ensure the safety and security of the students on campus."

MacLean said he is planning a day in September when the different faith groups on campus can come together to show they don't support hate crimes.

He said this will send a message to the perpetrators that "they can't take Ryerson down with them. Racism is not tolerated on campus."

Last week, Premier Dalton McGuinty denounced the incidents at Ryerson, saying, "I strongly condemn these cowardly acts, which are an affront to Ontarians and our way of life."

101-year-old gets aliyah at camp on his birthday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Rarely, if ever, will you see a 101-year-old man have an aliyah at a children's camp.

Abraham (Abe) Lieff, a former justice of the Ontario Supreme Court, the first Jew to hold this position, was a special guest at Camp Ramah recently to celebrate his 101st birthday. He was given an aliyah during the reading of a Torah that was dedicated in his honour at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue on his 100th birthday.

A stipulation was that in addition to the Torah being read at the synagogue, where Lieff is a member, it would be taken to Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont., each summer to be read by the children there.

At a Shacharit service at the camp, Lieff was joined at the Torah by Ryan Stern of Toronto, a 13-year-old camper whose bar mitzvah will be celebrated this fall. Some 130 campers, 40 staff members and several visitors participated in the service in the large recreation hall.

Abraham Lieff

The camp's Rabbi Matthew Futterman said the power and beauty of our tradition were symbolized by Ryan and Lieff standing together, reciting the same blessing, separated by 88 years of life, but joined by the same dedication and commitment to Torah.

This is the second year Lieff has attended a service at the camp, and he told The CJN he hopes to be there again next summer. He says he is dedicated to teaching Torah to children.

"That is the charter of rights for all mankind," he says. He adds that when he was in court, "I never sat there alone, God was always there with me."

Lieff's love affair with Camp Ramah began about 50 years ago, and "my grandchildren went to camp Ramah more than 30 years ago and I would visit them. I was very impressed with the camp."

Lieff was one of seven children born to Esther and Bernard Lifshitz in the shtetl of Antopol in the province of Grodno in White Russia (now Belarus). The family fled the anti-Semitic pogroms there in 1905 and came to Ottawa when Lieff was one year old.

He was called to the bar at Osgoode Hall in 1926 and ultimately became a well-known lawyer and assistant Crown attorney. He moved to Toronto in 1963 when he was appointed a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He was the first lawyer to take his oath of office holding a Jerusalem Bible and the first to wear a kippah during the ceremony.

Lieff served for 17 years as president of the first Conservative synagogue in Ottawa, Agudath Israel Congregation, which he helped found. His first contact with Camp Ramah came during a visit to Ottawa by Rabbi Max Arzt, provost of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, who came to speak to the congregation.

Lieff was embarrassed at the poor showing at a lecture. "When I apologized on behalf of our community," Lieff says, "Rabbi Arzt said his trip to Ottawa would be worthwhile if our community would send many of our children to Camp Ramah. And that began my 50-year love affair with Camp Ramah."

At the camp this year, the Torah was read by camper Eran Markose, 15, now of Jerusalem, whose father is Rabbi Howard Markose, and mother, Judy Markose, runs the Ramah Israel summer seminar.

At the conclusion of the Shacharit service, Lieff gave a dvar Torah on the word rechem (rachmones, compassion and mercy), stressing the importance of justice and compassion in law. He spoke of the 13 attributes of God and encouraged the campers to say the Shema, "which goes to the very heart of our belief."

He urged the campers to be strong Jewish leaders for the next generation.

"I felt as if I was talking to my own grandchildren. They are beautiful children in a beautiful Jewish environment," he says.

"It was wonderful to participate in a thoroughly Jewish atmosphere conducted by children who knew what they were doing and to whom Jewish living in the camping circumstances was an absolute joy."

He is proud of the young leaders Ramah produces "such as my granddaughter Sharon Cohen Barker, who lives in Massachusetts and attended Camp Ramah. She became a volunteer at the federation at a senior level and now her children are at Camp Ramah in Massachusetts."

Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, director of the National Ramah Commission, who attended the service says, "The service was incredibly inspiring, as it brought together people from many different generations, all concerned with the Jewish future.

"Judge Lieff's commitment to Ramah camping was incredible, and at 101, he expressed it to the campers, staff and visitors in a beautiful way. Camp Ramah throughout North America has been in existence since 1947 and it continues to inspire thousands of young Jews to lead committed Jewish lives."

"And this", says Lieff, "brings me much joy and hope for the future of our people."

Coast to Coast

Day says media have targeted him

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Conservative foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day charged that he is being "marginalized" for his outspoken support of Israel by a Canadian media obsessed with the Jewish state's alleged wrongdoings.

Day made the remark following his acceptance from the pro-Israel think tank, the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), of its Golden Magen David Award for his "consistent" defence of Israel throughout his political career.

In his remarks, Day blasted the media for focusing on suspicions that a Mossad secret service agent used a Canadian passport and ignoring far more egregious activity by Israel's enemies.

He related how a "hostile" reporter called him "demanding clarification" on his party's position on the "Israeli government's great crime."

"I was mystified… Where was the demand for clarification when the foreign minister of the Palestinian Authority said the PLO charter was never changed on the denial of Israel's right to exist? Or when Rifat Sayyed Ahmad, director of the Jaffa Research Centre, writes in Egypt's state-controlled newspaper in a recent article that the Holocaust is a Zionist lie to extort the West? Or when the imam of the leading Muslim association in Britain says, 'Yes, Israel has the nuclear bomb, but we have children bombs that we will continue to use until liberation'?

"Israel's response to these and countless other travesties should be used to inspire others to democracy and respect for human rights."

Day was also critical of Canada's voting record at the United Nations over the past 10 years on resolutions denouncing Israel. Of the 113 such resolutions, 75 were supported by Canada and Canada abstained on 38, he noted.

"There were zero condemning the non-democratic nations surrounding Israel," he said.

Day said that while in Tehran last year meeting pro-democracy supporters, he held up Israel as an example for Iran.

He also referred to "Taiwan, which is intimidated by the communist government [of China and] should use Israel as an example of standing up, against all odds, for what's right. Things that were declared impossible, Israel has proven can be achieved."

In accepting the award, Day said, "With no pretense of humility, I do not consider myself worthy when I compare myself to those who live in Israel or those here have done so much for Israel. The mild grief I have taken pales in comparison."

Day said the CIJR's daily electronic briefings on Israel have been "very helpful to us… So much does not get into the mainstream media."

Evoking Natan Sharansky's refusal to recant his activism for Jewish emigration when a Soviet judge offered him freedom in exchange, Day said, "I will continue to fight for Israel and everything it stands for, which is everything that is important to us."

Day admitted he has become "discouraged [by] how little of the true message about Israel is getting through." When he is down, he said his wife Valerie, with "her heart and passion for Israel," lifts him up. The couple visited Israel last year.

Questioned after the formal presentation, Day reiterated that he had "taken heat" from the media on his Israel position, but there is "no way it is going to change.

"The media has a very Arabist position, and I have taken some direct hits. The media tend to marginalize you on other issues for that, blending it all together."

Despite his strong support, he said the Conservative party has no plans to call for Canada to move its embassy to Jerusalem, an issue that helped topple Joe Clark's short-lived Progressive Conservative government in 1980.

Rosh Hashanah and Continuity...

This time of year in the Jewish calendar is all about beginnings and recommitments. Thankfully, once again, we are given the opportunity to begin anew and to recommit to the people, the values and the way of life that are most precious to us. If staying connected to the Jewish community in Canada and abroad is part of that new beginning for you , there is no better vehicle for doing so than The Canadian Jewish News.

As a way of helping individuals launch their new beginnings, The CJN is introducing a special continuity subscription offer in time for Rosh Hashanah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $19.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Could there be a better gift at Rosh Hashanah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Human rights museum downplays funding rift

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The executive director of the Asper Foundation, which is leading the drive to build a human rights museum in Manitoba's capital, is downplaying reports Ottawa may renege on a verbal promise to contribute $100 million to the project.

"We continue to dialogue with the government and are optimistic that at the end of the day we will get the support we need," said Moe Levy, adding that if all the federal money doesn't come through, "it may take us a little longer to build, but we expect to be successful."

The federal government has already pledged $30 million to the Canadian Museum for Human Rights project, but has yet to confirm the other $70 million.

After the recent federal election, the Winnipeg Free Press ran a series of articles that questioned the new Liberal government's willingness to commit all of the money, and the ability of museum backers to build it without federal funding. The original deal for federal funding was said to be between the late philanthropist Israel Asper, head of CanWest Global Communications, and former prime minister Jean Chrétien, the Free Press reported.

If all goes as planned, construction will start this fall on an 8.2-acre site in the Forks district of downtown Winnipeg, with the opening of the $200-million museum slated for July 2007.

The winner of the international competition to design the museum was scheduled to be publicized July 1, but Levy said the announcement has been delayed for a few weeks because some of the finalists are on holidays. Two Canadian architects and one U.S. firm have made it to the final three.

The museum was Asper's last major project before his sudden death last September. He launched his campaign to build the museum on April 17, 2003, the 22nd anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Asper Family, through the Asper Foundation, has pledged up to $50 million toward the project, while the province and the city have agreed to contribute $20 million apiece.

The remaining money is being solicited from the private sector through the National Friends of the Canadian Museum of Human Rights, whose goal is to raise $60 million for an endowment fund to help build and run the institution.

As of May, private fundraising had raised $34 million.

Former heritage minister Sheila Copps told CBC News that Ottawa is reneging on its promise, saying, "[Treasury Board President] Reg Alcock knows very well that the $30 million was a down payment."

A spokesperson for Alcock, a Winnipeg MP and Manitoba's senior voice in cabinet, said the minister (who is on holidays this month), "has been and continues to be committed to the project. He supports the late Israel Asper's vision and has been working hard in Ottawa to raise awareness about the museum."

As to the additional money, the spokesperson said museum organizers actually want Ottawa to contribute $70 million more for construction and $12 million a year for 10 years for operations.

"That's asking for $220 million," he said.

"It's rare for the federal government to put out that kind of money for any one project. It would also make Mr. Alcock's job easier if there were a signed document. This is an extraordinary project for Winnipeg, Manitoba and Canada, but it is going to take time to come up with the money."

In an interview, Premier Gary Doer said the museum is "an important project for the province, for the city and for the country. It has our full support. We continue to be optimistic it is going to go ahead."

He told CBC that he also believed the $30 million from Ottawa was a down payment and that Asper would never have gone ahead with the April 2003 announcement "without a strong indication from the federal government that they were committed for the grand vision."

Newly elected Winnipeg mayor Sam Katz said the city remains committed to the project.

"It appears that there are a few hurdles to get over," he said, adding he too, is, confident it will proceed.

"Everyone who supports the museum should be lobbying to get this done. I am sure that it will get done, but it will require patience. It can be hard being patient, but we have to be."

The museum hopes to draw 350,000 visitors a year – including 100,000 students – and will sell itself as a Canadian landmark

It will feature a 70-metre Tower of Hope, a Holocaust Gallery, a Hall of Fame and Shame, a Canadian Gallery exploring dark periods in Canadian history, a daily "barometer of hate" measuring hate levels around the world, an exhibit on human rights in crisis, wireless palm pilots for students to record their impressions, and a "virtual museum" to connect the museum to the rest of the world through the internet.

Dallaire Institute teaches educators how to fight hate

By HAILEY EISEN
Special to The CJN

LONDON, Ont. — Violent acts of hate often begin in the schoolyard and last week high school teachers in London, Ont., were learning how to take the anti-hate battle to their classrooms.

About 40 educators took part in the first bi-annual General Romeo Dallaire Summer Institute for Teaching Genocide and the Holocaust, which was held at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) from Aug. 9 to 13. The institute, one of the first of its kind in Canada, aimed to provide educational tools for promoting the importance of tolerance and human rights.

Sponsored by London's Association for the Elimination of Hate, the week-long institute, one of the first of its kind in Canada, was established to fill a void in a city where organizers say little attention is given to teaching about racism and intolerance in high school classrooms.

"For many, teaching the Holocaust and genocide can be incredibly intimidating," said Amanda Grzyb, a professor of genocide and the Holocaust at UWO and an instructor at the institute.

"Our aim is to prepare teachers to become more comfortable with these materials."

With a focus on Armenia, the Holocaust and Rwanda, the institute not only chronicled some of the most horrific genocides of the 20th century, it also emphasized teaching themes and moral lessons.

"We want to direct teachers towards the teachable moments in genocide history," said program co-ordinator Rich Hitchens. "For example, we want to talk to them about rescue and how that can teach people about the importance of individual responsibility."

Lessons about the Holocaust and genocide were facilitated by university professors, military experts, and community members, and participants were advised on how best to incorporate literature and film resources into their teachings.

"To slap [the Holocaust-themed feature film] Schindler's List in for 3½ hours is going to take most of the time teachers have dedicated to the unit, whereas they could show a 28-minute documentary film that will generate three hours of instruction," Grzyb said.

The institute also incorporated lessons gained from first-hand experience.

The institute's namesake, retired Canadian general Romeo Dallaire, met with the teachers and offered his congratulations and support for the community's involvement in genocide education.

Dallaire led UN forces during the 1994 Rwanda operation, where he defied direct orders to evacuate his troops from the troubled area when violence escalated into full-scale genocide. Some 40,000 refugees found sanctuary in his safe-havens. It is estimated that one million Tutsis and moderate Hutus were killed within 100 days.

For the past three years, Dallaire has worked with high school and university students to promote awareness and action about areas of international crisis and genocide.

"My aim in this whole education process is to gel Canadian youth into getting into an activist mentality," he said. "So far I'm getting a lot of positive vibes."

In the wake of reports of genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, many religious and ethnic communities in London have come together to support this education initiative.

At the institute's kick-off event, the Association for the Elimination of Hate announced plans to develop a museum of education and tolerance in London within the next five years.

Grafstein wants to revisit anti-Semitism question

Plans to bring issue before the Senate this fall

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Although the Senate's human rights committee held only one hearing on anti-Semitism before adjourning for the summer, Sen. Jerry Grafstein plans to bring the issue before his colleagues when the Senate reconvenes on Oct. 5.

Grafstein said he would introduce a motion to create a new committee that will take up study of his motion on anti-Semitism, which is based on a resolution adopted unanimously by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE).

The resolution calls on member states to unequivocally condemn anti-Semitism and to address the growing phenomenon through legislation.

As a member of the OSCE, Canada is obliged to examine the subject and take steps to counter the recent upsurge in anti-Semitism, he said. Other OSCE members, such as the United States and France, have held hearings and issued statements against anti-Semitism. France has even amended its hate laws to ensure prosecutions, he said.

Grafstein, who serves as treasurer of the OSCE's parliamentary wing, said the 55-member organization, at its recent Parliamentary Assembly in Edinburgh, Scotland, passed unanimously a supplementary resolution on anti-Semitism.

In the supplementary resolution, the OSCE agreed that participating states would ensure that their governments acquire the authority and resources to track anti-Semitic incidents and hate crimes; ensure laws are in place to prosecute perpetrators of anti-Semitic acts and hate crimes; and "create mechanisms to help ensure education and training for educators, military forces and law enforcement and judicial officers concerning racism, anti-Semitism and the Holocaust, xenophobia and intolerance… "

In introducing the supplementary motion, Grafstein noted that statistics recently released in Canada showed that more than 25 per cent of hate crimes involved Jews, making them the most-targeted group.

Grafstein said the supplementary resolution continues the momentum created two and a half years ago in Berlin, when the first OSCE resolution to address anti-Semitism was passed. Since then, the OSCE has held a number of conferences and the issue has remained on the organization's agenda. UN Secretary General Kofi Annan credited the OSCE resolution for influencing the United Nations' first conference on anti-Semitism in June, he noted.

Canadian parliamentarians, however, have been slow to take up the issue because they feel no political pressure to do so, Grafstein said. Although Canadian Jewish Congress made a presentation on the single day the Senate held hearings, the Jewish community has failed to indicate they view the Senate committee's work as important.

"The Senate has not received any lobbying to pursue this by the community at large," he said. He contrasted that response to the more than 3,500 e-mails on gay marriage he received in a 10-day span. That kind of public response grabs the notice of legislators, he said.

Grafstein is hoping to keep the issue of anti-Semitism on the Senate's agenda. "We've got a problem in Canada and we have not addressed it. So you have to be relentless," he said.

Government seeks nominations for security roundtable

Nominations are open for membership in the federal government's new Cross-Cultural Roundtable on Security.

"My hope is that the roundtable will give expression to our shared citizenship and common commitment to the protection of security and human rights in Canada's multicultural society," says Justice Minister Irwin Cotler. "Our government is looking forward to engaging Canadians of diverse backgrounds in an ongoing dialogue on national security issues."

The creation of such a body was a key commitment in the government report released in April, Securing an Open Society: Canada's National Security Policy.

Cotler and Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan will appoint a maximum of 15 members to the roundtable from the nominations. Terms are for one year and may be renewed for a maximum of three terms.

Nominees are required to have:

- an awareness of security matters as they relate to the community;
- experience in engaging diverse and pluralistic communities;
- an ability to facilitate the exchange of information with communities; and
- commitment to building safer communities.

Members must also be Canadian citizens or permanent residents.

More information and nomination forms can be found at www.psepc.gc.ca/roundtable. All nominations must be received or postmarked by Sept. 17.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Summer salads you can use as a main course

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

With summer underway, who wants to add to the heat by cooking?

Thanks to the ever-versatile salad, you don't have to stand the heat to stay in the kitchen.

A trip to the produce department of most grocery stores will yield a variety of salad ingredients as well as many ready-made salads. Some stores now even have salad bars where you can build your own salad by the pound. Salads are quick and easy, and they can move from being side dishes to being the centerpiece of a summer meal.

And salads aren't just for dieters anymore. Today's salads can be much more than lettuce and a few other fresh vegetables. For a surprisingly delightful meal, be creative and add to a base of fresh greens some of your favourites, things like fresh summer fruits or maybe some cooked beef or chicken or smoked turkey from the deli.

Salads are also the perfect home for some of your leftovers. You can take that extra chicken or steak from last night's grilling and make it the star of tonight's meal.

For a change of pace, try leaving out the lettuce entirely. Create your salad from any of summer's rich bounty of fruits and vegetables. Or rely on some of the sweet, juicy fruits to grace your dressing and provide the perfect finish to your salad.

And speaking of dressings, try adding some fresh herbs to your salad or toss them in when mixing your own salad dressings. Herbs blend well with a lot of summer fruits and vegetables, creating unique flavours. Or you can opt for a pasta or bean salad, which requires a little more work than just the tearing of the greens, but is more than worth it. Most pasta and bean salads are designed to be served either warm or cold, making them great as main dishes or perfect complements on picnics or at barbecues.

Don't be afraid to experiment. Just adding a few of your favourites can turn a boring salad into something special. Add some crusty French bread, and maybe a cold soup, and a summer salad can become a cool, tasty meal. Best of all, salads won't overheat your kitchen (or your temper).

Most of these salads are suitable for main course dishes. The ingredients can be substituted for or switched, according to your tastes.

CURRIED CHICKEN FRUIT SALAD

Sweet, juicy orange segments and grapes give freshness and colour to this salad. Cooked deli chicken or smoked turkey substitutes nicely for the poached chicken if you don't want to cook.

1 lb. boned and skinned chicken breast halves (3 medium)
1/2 cup mayonnaise
1/4 cup apricot jam
1 to 2 tsp. curry powder
2 navel oranges, peeled and cut into segments
3/4 cup pitted prunes, halved
1/4 cup red and/or green seedless grapes
3/4 cups sliced celery
1/3 cup chopped red onion
salt and pepper to taste
4 lettuce leaves

In 2-quart saucepan, cover chicken with cold water. Bring to boil, reduce heat and simmer about 12 minutes until chicken is opaque throughout and no pink remains. Meanwhile, in large bowl, mix mayonnaise, jam and curry powder to blend thoroughly.

Mix in orange segments, prunes, grapes, celery and onion. Drain chicken and cut across the grain into 1/3-in. slices. Add to bowl; toss. Season with salt and pepper. Arrange lettuce leaves on four individual plates or serving platter. Fill each leaf with chicken mixture, dividing equally. Or use as a filling for pita sandwiches. Makes 4 main-dish servings.

CALIFORNIA NEW POTATO SALAD

This is made without mayonnaise or eggs and can be kept without refrigeration for several hours. The potato salad includes artichokes and red peppers. Serve it with cold cuts or sliced turkey breast on a salad plate, garnished with tomato.

1 lb. small new potatoes, scrubbed and halved
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 garlic clove, pressed or minced
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice or rice vinegar
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. dried rosemary, crushed
1/2 tsp.salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
8-oz. can quartered artichokes or 1 jar marinated artichokes, drained
1/2 cup diced red bell peppers
1/2 cup chopped scallions

Put the potatoes in a large saucepan and cover with cold water. Bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce the heat to low and simmer for about 10 minutes, or until just fork tender. Meanwhile, heat the oil in a large nonstick skillet. Add the garlic and cook for 1 minute or just until the garlic sizzles. Remove from the heat and stir in the balsamic vinegar, lemon juice or rice vinegar, mustard, rosemary, salt and black pepper.

Drain the potatoes and add to the skillet. Toss or stir well to coat the potatoes. Transfer to a large bowl. Add the artichokes, red peppers and scallions. Mix well. Store leftovers, tightly covered, in the refrigerator. Makes 4 cups.

CHOPPED SALAD WITH HERB-MUSTARD VINAIGRETTE

For this chopped salad, the greens can be cut into small pieces for easy eating. Combine them with strips of Italian salami, turkey breast and chick peas for an antipasto-like salad. The recipe makes a large amount, but you can reduce the amounts.

Vinaigrette:
1 tsp. minced fresh garlic
2 tsp. minced fresh shallot
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 1/2 tsp. dried oregano
2 tsp. dried parsley
1/2 tsp. ground black pepper
1/4 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 cup red-wine vinegar
1 cup pure, mild-flavoured olive oil

Salad:
1/2 head iceberg lettuce, chopped into in.-wide strips
1/2 head romaine lettuce, chopped into 1/8-in.-wide strips
12 large leaves of basil, chopped into 1/16-inch- wide strips
2 cups (1/2 lb.) dry Italian or other salami, cut into thin strips
1 cup chopped garbanzo beans
4 cups (2 lb.) ripe tomatoes, diced 1/2-in.
3 cups (1 lb.) turkey breast, diced 1/2-in.
2 tbsp. chopped scallions, 1/2-in. pieces

To make the vinaigrette: Process all ingredients except oil in a food processor or blender (or use a whisk in a small bowl). Slowly blend in oil. Set aside in the refrigerator.

To make the salad: Toss lettuces, basil, salami and garbanzos together in a large mixing bowl. Transfer to platter or salad bowl. Surround with a ring of diced tomatoes and top with diced turkey breast. Garnish with chopped scallions. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

הגעתם לקנדה מתישהו ויש לכם שניים-שלושה ילדים? הינה מחשבה חשובה עבורכם:

העבודה פחות או יותר בסדר, הבריאות ברוך השם. יש חברים, בעיקר ישראלים. סביר מאוד להניח שאיתכם דתיים ושאיתכם הולכים לבית כנסת ואיכם שולחים את ילדיכם לבתי ספר יהודיים, אתם אומרים לעצמכם שאתם רוצים שהם ילמדו אנגלית וייקלטו. עם יד על הלב-אם בתי ספר יהודיים היו בחינם-הילדים שלכם היו שם תוך דקה (זו איננה ביקורת, כי הלימודים שם באמת יקרים). השנים עוברות. אתם גאים בכך שאתם מדברים עם הילדים בעברית, אך הם ענים לכם באנגלית. אתם חושבים שהם סופגים מֵכֶם את ה"ישראליות" שלכם. אתם טועים בגדול.

יש רק פתרון אחד: תנועת נוער ישראלית. כמעט בחינם, ילדים יהודיים, תוכן ציוני. אני עברתי את זה 4 פעמים בהצלחה של מאה אחוז. יש בטורונטו את השומר הצעיר, יהודה הצעיר, צופים, בית"ר, תנועות דתיות. כל הקשת הפוליטית. אל תחכו, אל תחמיצו, אל תצטערו. ראו, הזדהרתם. ושישאר בינינו.

זהירות-סרטים ישראלים

קוראים ותיקים יודעים שאני ממליץ רק על סרטים שממש אהבתי ולא מביזבז את הטור הצר הזה על דברים שלדעתי לא כדאי לבזבז עליהם זמן. אני גם מנסה לראות, מסיבות ברורות, כמה שיותר סרטים ישראלים. הפעם אני חייב לחרוג מהרגלי ולהזהיר אתכם משני מוקשים רציניים.

Olympic judo officials gathering evidence in case

"I can assure you that we are studying very seriously this question, but we need to have more elements," IJF spokesperson Michel Brousse told reporters on Monday.

"Before talking about sanctions, it is necessary to know exactly what we are talking about. Someone was overweight that is clear, but we do not punish overweight people.

"Someone is innocent until he is proven guilty. So before speaking of sanctions, we have to know exactly why he failed his weight."

Olympic judo officials said on Monday they also need to gather more evidence before any action can be taken against Iran.

Israeli judoka Yoel Razvozov was beaten in the third round of the under-73-kilogram repechage on Monday.

Razvozov won his first bout of the 2004 Olympic Games, beating Cuban opponent Robert Martinez by an ippon within nine seconds.

But Razvozov, the European silver medalist competing in the men's lightweight category, subsequently lost to French opponent Daniel Fernandes by an ippon. In the repechage, Razvozov beat his Chinese opponent in the second round, but was beaten by Brazilian Leandro Guilheiro in the third round.

Swimmer Vered Borochovsky, meanwhile, failed to make the semifinal of the women's 200-metre individual medley, despite winning her heat in a time of 02:20.62. Since her time was ranked 24 out of the 30 competitors, however, Borochovsky did not advance to the semifinals of the competition. Only the top 16 swimmers advanced to the semifinals.

Tennis player Anna Smashnova-Pistolesi lost late Monday morning 6-2 and 6-1 in the first round of the Olympic tennis tournament.

Gal Friedman moved up to the bronze-medal spot after the second day's men's Mistral sailboard race, while Marina Kravchenko downed the reigning European champion to move into the last 32 in the women's table-tennis singles, in an improved second day of competition for Israel.

Friedman, the 1996 Atlanta Games bronze medalist and the 2002 world champion, had finished fifth in the day's first race and third in the second, leaving him in fifth spot overall, but the first race was later cancelled after a mix-up in allocation of lanes. The cancellation of the race leapfrogged Friedman into third place behind Przemyslaw Miarczynski of Poland and Joao Rodrigues of Portugal, while home favourite Nikos Kaklamanakis dropped from first to fourth.

Razvozov wins first bout

Lee Korsitz, Israel's 2003 women's Mistral world champion, finished both of Sunday's races in 15th place and currently places 15th overall.

Israel's sole table-tennis competitor, Marina Kravchenko, who said before the competition that her expectation was to advance one round – on condition that she avoided Asian contestants – on Sunday made it through to the last 32 of the competitors, after beating the former European champion, Otilia Badescu of Romania, 11-6, 11-9, 4-11, 11-3, 8-11 and 11-6.

Kravchenko managed to avoid the Asians in the next round as well, but will play against Tamara Boros of Croatia, the world No. 6 and highest-ranked, non-Asian player in the Games.

"It was a big surprise," said Kravchenko's coach Isaac Cohen. "She played against the European champion who took third at the world championship."

Judoka Udi Vaks won his first match by default on Sunday when his Iranian opponent, Arash Miresmaili, exceeded weight requirements, after saying Sunday that he would refuse to compete against an Israeli.

Vaks then lost his next fight to Amar Meridja of Algeria after conceding a yuko with 30 seconds remaining. Vaks was denied a place in the repechage round after Meridja was downed in his quarter-final bout.

Israel's poor start to the judo competition continued when Michal Feinblatt went down to an ippon from Telma Monteiro of Portugal in the women's under-52-kilogram category.

There was no success for Israel in the pool, either, as Anja Gostamelsky failed to make the semifinals in the 100-metre backstroke event, ending in fifth place with a time of 1:04:06 – more than a second behind her personal best.

Back at the sailing regatta, double-handed 470 class dinghy pair Udi Gal and Gidi Klieger edged up the standing after finishing Sunday's races in 6th and 8th place; they are now 8th overall.

In the women's 470 class, Vered Buskila and Nika Kornitzki failed to recover from their disqualification in the opening race of the Games, and on Sunday came in 16th and then 19th after crashing into the Brazilian dinghy. After four races, they are in 18th place overall.

Israel's sailors remained in the water Monday along with swimmers Borochovski and Anja Gostamelsky. Men's tennis double pair Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich also began their campaign Monday.

Israel's budget passes despite disagreement

By MOTI BASSOK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Following a compromise reached between feuding Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, the cabinet approved the 2005 state budget of NIS 266.9 billion (about $77 billion Cdn) Sunday, by a 17-3 vote.

According to the agreement, the defence budget will be NIS 34.35 billion, which includes a "loan" of NIS 650 million from the 2006 state budget. The arrangement allows the treasury to claim that the defence budget, which was NIS 35 billion in 2004, was cut to NIS 33.7 billion in 2005.

Meanwhile, the budget for educational reform was boosted from NIS 1 billion to NIS 1.7 billion. Planned university tuition hikes were revoked, and the Health Ministry got an additional NIS 230 million.

Industry and Trade Minister Ehud Olmert, Interior Minister Avraham Poraz and Agriculture Minister Yisrael Katz voted against the budget.

In talks in which he criticized Netanyahu, Mofaz had demanded a NIS 1.76-billion increase in the defence budget, rejecting a NIS 1.5-billion planned cut, claiming there was no more room to reduce the scope of the military deployment or the size of the air force beyond those cuts already made. He said that of this year's 4,000 public-sector layoffs, 2,400 came from the defence establishment.

At Sunday's meeting in an exchange between Netanyahu and MKs Mofaz and Olmert, Netanyahu claimed the other two were trying to "win public support… [by attacking him]. Their unfounded claims serve as weapons for our political enemies in their attempts to torpedo the economic recovery plan."

Netanyahu added that "the result is damage to the Israeli economy, to the cabinet's credibility, and to our ability to continue to gain public support for structural change that will bring every Israeli citizen growth and prosperity in the coming years."

Netanyahu called the shrinking public sector the direct result of courageous and responsible economic policy which is "bringing Israel a large economy and a small government."

Netanyahu credited Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and most of the ministers' support with rescuing the country from the economic crisis of 2000-2003, saying they understood the need for difficult and unpopular steps.

EU says PA is OK

The European Union's anti-fraud unit said it has found no evidence the Palestinian Authority used EU funds for terror. In a statement last week, the unit said an ongoing investigation so far shows no misuse of EU funds. The office began investigating in February 2003 over concerns funds from the EU, the PA's largest single donor, were being used for illegal activity, including terror. The EU stressed in its statement – seen as a rarity while investigations are continuing – that it had worked closely with both Israeli and Palestinian officials. It also said the conclusions are interim findings.

Aliyah figures down

Aliyah was down by seven per cent in the first half of 2004, with 8,500 immigrants arriving, and is down 40 per cent compared to 2002. The 2004 decrease is due to a 14 per cent drop in immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Argentine aliyah is up 60 per cent, with increases also from France, Britain and Ethiopia. Last week, 230 more North American olim sponsored by the Jewish Agency and Nefesh B'Nefesh arrived in Israel.

Iraq threatened Israel: Franks

The threat of a missile attack on Israel was one reason for a pre-emptive strike on Iraq, retired U.S. general Tommy Franks said last week in Washington, D.C. Franks, who led the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, also said he supports the U.S. policy of pre-emption and that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict fuels anti-U.S. resentment in the Mideast.

Café Moment closes

A Jerusalem café that suffered a major Palestinian suicide bombing shut down last Monday, with the owners citing a failure to recover profitability after the March 2002 terror attack that killed 11 people. The closure of Café Moment surprised patrons who returned after renovations repaired damage from the attack.

Gandhi to help Palestinians

Mahatma Gandhi's grandson will head a Palestinian campaign of non-violent protest against Israel. Arun Gandhi was invited by a group of Palestinians from Ramallah interested in non-violent protest against Israel's West Bank security barrier and Israel's military presence in Palestinian areas. Gandhi, head of the Memphis, Tenn.-based M.K. Gandhi Institute for Nonviolence, will speak at three rallies planned in Ramallah, Abu Dis and Bethlehem on Aug. 26.

Iran tests missile

Iran said last week it had tested the latest version of its Shihab-3 medium-range ballistic missile, which is capable of reaching Israel. Iran says its missile program is purely for deterrence, but the United States and Israel say Iran is seeking to develop nuclear warheads, which could be delivered by the Shihab-3.

Canadian Birthright Israel youth give the 'gift of life'

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

When 27-year-old Torontonian Ari Pollack arrived in Israel for the first time earlier this month, on a Birthright Israel trip through Canada Israel Experience (CIE), the last thing he expected was to be asked to take part in a bone-marrow test.

"I was a little taken aback because it was sort of a brisk request," he says. "But I was thankful for the opportunity. If my bone-marrow type matches someone in need, I will be happy to help them."

Pollack was in the first 60-member group of Birthright Israel-CIE participants to agree to be tested by the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation at the Caesar Hotel in Jerusalem on Sunday, Aug. 8.

Gift of Life was established in 1991 by New Jersey leukemia patient Jay Feinberg. After being diagnosed that year, he launched an ambitious campaign to recruit bone marrow and blood stem cell donors of eastern European Jewish ethnicity. Tissue type is inherited and the chances of finding a match within one's ethnic group are much greater than finding a match outside one's ethnic group.

Since finding Feinberg's life-saving match in 1995, the foundation, which aims to increase Jewish ethnic representation within the international donor pool, has recruited more than 75,000 potential donors. Although the initiative started as a grassroots effort to save one life, the campaign has facilitated transplants for hundreds of other people with blood-related diseases who were in desperate need of life-saving matches.

But it was only after 36-year-old Feinberg won the inaugural Charles Bronfman Prize – a humanitarian award recognizing his achievements – in April that it occurred to Feinberg, Bronfman, and Lorne Klemensberg, director of Israel programs for CIE, to draw potential donors from Canadian Birthright Israel participants.

Canadian participants on a recent Birthright Israel trip took part in a bone-marrow test in Jerusalem.

"We call Birthright Israel 'the gift from one generation to the next,' so we figured we would give participants an opportunity to give the 'gift of life,'" says Klemensberg. "It's a way for the Canadian Jewish community to pass on the gift."

Like Pollack, 26-year-old Robyn Seidman from Montreal was grateful for the chance to take part in the bone-marrow test. "The fact that we were given the opportunity to help somebody was a reward in itself," says Seidman. "If someone I loved was in trouble and there was someone out there who matched them, I would hope that they would help.

"So I didn't think twice about doing it for somebody else. I was happy for the opportunity. I am only sorry that I didn't do it sooner.

"Besides," she adds, "the test only took a minute."

According to Rafi Freudenberger at Gift of Life, the initial test is quick and painless. Potential donors are given a buccal swab kit, which looks like a Q-Tip, to rub against the inside of their cheeks. The kits, which cost $100 US to process, are then shipped to a lab in North Carolina, where they get tissue-typed.

The results are registered in the Gift of Life database, a participating registry in the World Marrow Donor Association and Bone Marrow Donors Worldwide, and an affiliate of the Caitlin Raymond International Registry, which serves transplant centers around the world.

If a match is found, the donor is asked to take a test that involves drawing blood to confirm that he or she is a match.

If it's confirmed that the donor's marrow matches the recipient's, the donor goes to a transplant center, where one of two methods is used to extract marrow.

The first technique involves the donor being injected with a drug to increase the body's production of stem cells five days before the transplant. Blood is then extracted from the donor through a machine, which filters stem cells from the blood before returning it to the donor.

The second method involves a minor operation in which marrow is extracted directly from the donor's hipbone.

Given the relative intrusiveness of the extraction techniques, Klemensberg says he tells all potential donors what testing could entail.

"The choice to get tested is totally voluntary, and we tell them that if they are not willing to go through with it, then they shouldn't bother with the first stage of testing," he says.

"It's a very hard decision and we want them to donate responsibly."

Nevertheless, Klemensberg intends to continue to ask Birthright Israel-CIE participants to be tested. By the end of the summer, an additional 300 youth will have been asked. "The more help we can offer, the better," he says.

Pollack couldn't agree more. "Given the fact that we were given such a great gift in coming here, it was the least I could do. I was happy for the opportunity to give back," he says.

"This initiative demonstrates the solidarity between Jews, even on a biological level. It makes you think about how related we are to one another. That is one other thing that inspired me to get tested. There is one thing that I have in common with everyone on this bus and that is that we are all Jews."

Supermarkets take on Super-Pharm

By SIVAN KLINGBAIL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Limited

TEL AVIV — Israel's major supermarket chains are trying to muscle in on the traditional product base of Super-Pharm, the country's largest drugstore operator.

Already under attack from cut-price out-of-town megastores, the big grocery players – Supersol, Blue Square and Clubmarket – are trying to win back customers lost to Super-Pharm with special prices and by attacking the drug retailer in its traditional field of pharmaceuticals, toiletries, cosmetics and baby products, sources in the sector say.

In retaliation, Super-Pharm – a 100-outlet chain led by Canadian-born chairman and CEO Leon Koffler – is out to strike special deals with its suppliers, including exclusivity over certain products.

This was clearly the case in a recent spat, when Super-Pharm pulled Materna's baby food products off its shelves as the supplier would not grant it similar deals to other stores. Though no details were released on the dispute, when Materna's products returned to the store's shelves last week, they were under the same special offer seen at competitors such as New Pharm. Someone had clearly flexed muscle, and won.

"Super-Pharm is not out to earn wider retail margins through higher prices, like the food store chains, but by increasing market share," said one of the sources.

Yair Asa'el, vice-president of marketing and trade at Super-Pharm, confirms that competition has heated up, but added that the store has maintained its market share. Some major suppliers, though, say Super-Pharm has been losing out to the large supermarkets and private stores too.

In 2003, Super-Pharm saw 9 per cent growth in sales with revenues of NIS 2.1 billion. It reported 8 per cent growth in cosmetics and drugs and 5.5 per cent growth in toiletries. As a privately held company, Super-Pharm is not obliged to release full results, but it's clear that the 9 per cent boost in sales came at the expense of the major retail chains.

Desecrations a wake-up call for New Zealand Jews

By MIRIAM BELL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

AUCKLAND, New Zealand — They were deeply disturbing images to wake up to on a mid-winter Friday morning: more than 90 desecrated gravestones, a burnt-out prayer house and two swastikas – one emblazoned on a wall, the other carved into the ground among the fallen headstones.

Analysis

Even more disturbing was the fact the images weren't from Europe or the Middle East, but from normally placid New Zealand, from Makara cemetery in Wellington, the capital.

For a society that prides itself on fairness and tolerance, the attack was a shock that left both Jews and non-Jews wondering how it could happen in a "God-zone."

Rabbi Jeremy Lawrence said many members of his Auckland Hebrew Congregation were distressed by the attack, the second such desecration in weeks.

"It's an incredibly emotive attack on consecrated ground. Every culture understands our ancestors are not to be touched – it violates the whole idea of 'rest in peace.' And it evokes the most terrible memories, especially for the older generation, of the past," he said.

But for many, the most disturbing part may be the realization New Zealand is not immune to anti-Semitism.

"As a Jew here, where people felt comfortable, secure and non-threatened for so long, suddenly there have been a number of not necessarily connected incidents which have made Jews in New Zealand more aware they are Jews in New Zealand," Rabbi Lawrence said.

The desecrations came after the highly publicized convictions of two Israelis who fraudulently tried to obtain a New Zealand passport. With public sentiment already turning strongly anti-Israel and pro-Palestinian, Prime Minister Helen Clark accused the men of being Mossad agents and imposed diplomatic sanctions on Israel, which has refused to confirm or deny that they worked for its intelligence services.

The passport affair followed recent debate over fiercely anti-Israeli – and, some said, anti-Semitic – drawings by a prominent editorial cartoonist, and over whether to let Holocaust denier David Irving give speeches in the country.

(In an interview last week with National Radio, Irving offered a $1,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the vandals. He previously said "disordered members" of the local Jewish community might be responsible, a claim repeated by the New Zealand secretary of the right-wing National Front party.)

New Zealand does not have a history of overt anti-Semitism. Lately, however, there has been a noticeable public shift in perceptions of Israel, said John Barnett, a prominent member of the Jewish community.

"This shift can be seen in the media and at government levels, and there is no doubt that for many people, being Jewish is synonymous with Israel," he said.

A film and TV producer best known for the international movie hit Whale Rider, Barnett believes New Zealand has changed from a strong supporter and friend of Israel to a country that sees Israel as an aggressor and the Palestinians as Mideast underdogs.

Barnett said "lunatic fringes" may have felt emboldened by Clark's outburst against Israel after the passport affair.

"I don't think Clark thought her words would do any such thing. She's a decent person who doesn't set out to hurt people," Barnett says. "But her comments say to some people that it's fair game to commit acts like this."

There has been much debate about Clark's motives for making her strong statements – speculation ranges from a desire to shows she's a strong leader to trade considerations.

Opinion varies widely, even among Jews. Some say Clark's administration is extremely anti-Israel, while others say Clark used the affair to distract voters from political problems at home.

Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, blamed Clark's government for the surge in anti-Semitism. "Being anti-Israel lends justification to anti-Semitism, and the connection between the two exists all over the world," he said last week.

David Zwartz, president of the country's Jewish Council and Israel's honorary consul in New Zealand, agreed that Clark's comments may have triggered the cemetery attacks. "There has been a long-term hardening of governmental policy towards Israel, and the government is now less sympathetic than it ever has been."

Zwartz noted a number of diplomatically unfriendly actions on the part of government members recently, including Foreign Minister Phil Goff's visit to Yasser Arafat – Israel has asked world leaders to stop meeting the Palestinian Authority president because of his ties to terrorism — and New Zealand's recent voting pattern on United Nations resolutions relating to Israel.

"The intifadah has not been well-reported here. There hasn't been balanced coverage at all," Zwartz said. "And that has built up a certain amount of antipathy toward Israel and, by extension, the Jewish community here, because people have never been very good at distinguishing between the two."

The result has been a subtle change in the public attitude. After the Aug. 6 vandalism at Makara cemetery, responses were a bit mixed.

Government reaction was immediate, with Michael Cullen, the acting prime minister, calling the attack ugly, unforgivable and "totally unacceptable." Minister for Ethnic Affairs Chris Carter submitted a resolution to Parliament denouncing anti-Semitism, and it passed unanimously.

But a sampling of talk programs and Internet chat rooms reveals darker sentiments about Zionist conspiracies and Jews complaining too much. For some New Zealand Jews, the slowness to comment on the part of some notable social and media commentators – or their outright silence – speaks volumes.

The community itself must become more vocal, said Janine Gaddie, a student at the University of Auckland.

Balancing work and life

Employers claim to endorse it. Employees yearn for it. It is the hottest topic among stress management experts, but do we really know how to do it? Can we achieve a work-life balance?

Remember the sense of excitement we experienced when we received our first laptop computer, cellphone and pager? We believed that these tools would permit us to achieve more freedom and efficiency, and give us extra time for ourselves.

In hindsight, we see that technology has not only caused an increase in our work hours and reduced the quality – and quantity – of our leisure time, it has also put us at risk for car accidents, heart attacks and burnout. We are never able to "shut off" work.

There used to be a much clearer separation between our work life and our home life. People would go to a workplace, clock their hours and then leave and forget about work until the next day.

To understand how we can make positive strides toward taking control of our work-life balance, we must understand what causes us to feel that our work is never done.

All of us have both external and internal pressures. External pressures come from our peers, bosses, customers, co-workers and suppliers. We can't really control our external pressures, but we can control how we respond to them.

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

Internal pressures are the pressures that we bring upon ourselves. Type A personalities continuously seek to accomplish more and more, with a focus on quantity. Perfectionists strive for excellence, with a focus on quality. Type A perfectionists push relentlessly for both quantity and quality.

We are often our own worst enemies. We think negatively, and we set unreasonable expectations for ourselves.

In order to gain more control over how we respond to our external pressures, we need to evaluate the internal messages we give ourselves, and we need to reclaim our time. Some of the possible considerations for change are as follows:

• We must learn to diplomatically use the word "no." It is a very small, yet empowering word that will help us avoid becoming overloaded, stressed and frustrated. Saying "no" does not mean that we are being unco-operative. Saying "no" is merely an acknowledgment of our limitations. The key is to learn to say "no" assertively, yet with kindness, and to consider offering an alternative.

• We should remember that we are more than our job. Our job is what we do to earn a living; it is not who we are, and it is not our life.

• Get a life. Consider how we occupy ourselves when we finally do leave work. Do we enjoy any other part of our life? If not, then the time has come to take up some hobbies and to nurture our important relationships.

• Give ourselves permission to take some leisure time. We usually seek permission from our bosses, spouses, parents, siblings, friends, and even our children. But the real person who needs to give us permission is ourselves. We must rethink our definition of leisure, and understand that it is not a luxury, but a necessity.

• Shut off thinking about work. One way to accomplish that is to change from our work clothes as soon as we get home.

• Taking shortcuts or asking for or paying for help will add some leisure time to our schedule.

For me, regular exercise is a priority. Yet, I also want to spend quality time with my children, and it often seems that I don't have enough time for both. I realized that by doing them simultaneously, I can accomplish both of my goals. So now, when I run outdoors, I take one of my children along on his bicycle.

It's all about balance. By taking a bit more time for ourselves on a regular and consistent basis, we may find that we are even more productive – and content – in our work.

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

After eleven years as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents.

For high school students, Libman helps locate suitable college or university programs, and assists clients through the admissions process. She also helps sharpen up their academic skills in preparation for the faster pace of advanced studies.

For students already in college or university, Libman's expertise helps them consider career options, contemplate graduate schools, or navigate the complexity of professional school admissions. Libman's longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Libman often counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows the ropes and can suggest workable strategies for overcoming institutional barriers.

For students considering US schools, Libman recently participated in the prestigious Harvard Summer Institute on College Admissions.

The hardest questions in school aren't on the exam.

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

Expert individual educational counselling for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

Kindergarten & Child Care Combined

Upper Canada Child Care Centres is a growing family of 32 child care facilities throughout York Region and North York. In addition to operating quality, non-profit care for children ages 3 months to 12 years, five of our centres also offer specialized programs which combine junior and senior kindergarten education with a full day child care component. These kindergarten programs run five days per week for the full year. The Curriculum emphasizes language, mathematics, science and technology, personal and social development and the arts.

Educators facilitate the child's growth by providing a rich and stimulating program. Balanced to provide learning opportunities in all educational areas, our program offers carefully planned and monitored learning centres. These concrete experiences promote competency and encourage self esteem.

Some of the many advantages to this program include: low child:adult ratios, no need for bussing from school to daycare, daily contact with teachers and no alternate day schedules.

Extended hours, nutritious lunches and snacks are provided at no extra charge. Please see our ad for the Upper Canada Kindergarten Program nearest you. For more information on any Upper Canada program, please call our Head Office at 905-946-1113.

The YMCA Academy Keeps Growing

If your son or daughter is ambivalent about the relevance of school to their life goals; if he or she has been labeled "different", "learning disabled" or is increasingly disengaged, then the YMCA Academy is a place where they can thrive.

We are an independent secondary school offering teacher-delivered Ontario Ministry of Education credits. We have created a supportive and youth-friendly environment with an experienced staff team who bring energy and expertise to the classroom.

Our program includes experiential learning and career education opportunities; small classes; three semesters - so students can focus on fewer subjects and earn credits; foundational skill development (e.g., reading, writing, math computer literacy and life skills); outdoor education retreats at YMCA Camp Pinecrest and Cedar Glen Outdoor Education Centre; YMCA health and fitness membership; wireless laptop computer environment that takes learning out of the classroom; student-friendly hours. Tuition assistance available.

Give Your Child An Educational Advantage

As a result of the changes in the Ontario curriculum, students now face new challenges and more pressure to succeed than ever before. Math Masters provides a wide range of services to help their students meet these demands and achieve their academic goals.

The Math Masters student understands that the learning process is not a universal approach. The student is an individual, and each individual must apply the most effective and efficient means to reach his or her goal of academic excellence.

Personalized and self-paced learning programs cater to the needs and diverse learning styles of each individual student. Whether the student is enrolled in private tutoring, a credit course, or a support/enrichment program, the instructor will challenge and motivate the student to attain academic success.

Math Masters programs emphasize effective study skills, time management, organizational skills, motivational techniques, and memory training. The Math Masters student will experience an improvement in grades, long-term memory, confidence and self-esteem.

The Academy For Gifted Children – P.A.C.E.

The Academy for Gifted Children - P.A.C.E. is the only private school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E, is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers programs from Grade 1 through Grade 12. In addition to the basic skills, P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction, and a more complex approach to learning. A fully balanced program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program. Please call the school for registration information: 905-773-0997.

ORAYNU CONGREGATION FOR HUMANISTIC JUDAISM

Oraynu - a totally different Jewish School!

"Do you remember what Hebrew school was like when we were kids? Well, this is different. With a capital 'D'!"

Children are engaged in their learning at Oraynu. We teach through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches: our students experience the holidays, tzedakah projects and classroom by being involved first hand. Jewish history and culture are taught from a Humanistic perspective focusing on values.

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is fun – the children have a good time while experiencing a positive affirmation of their Jewishness. Intermarried families are very welcome.

"The children say that they enjoy themselves on Sunday morning."

Oraynu's teachers draw their students out of their shells. The children "do" and "act" in lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education projects, extra-curricular tzedakah projects, arts, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of lively fun.

"My kids love it here!"

Imagine a two-year B'nai Mitzvah program where B'nai Mitzvot choose their own projects. You may choose a group or individual ceremony. Torah readings are optional and our unique ceremony is in English.

ADAM WAXMAN, SON OF AL, MAKES THEATRICAL DEBUT

Toronto native Adam Waxman, who recently graduated from the renowned Neighborhood Acting Playhouse Theatre School in New York, made his acting debut recently as Romeo in "Shakespeare By the Sea" in Halifax.

"Halifax is a wonderful change from New York," said Waxman, whose portrayal of Romeo garnered notable mention.

"The chemistry between this Romeo and Juliet is visceral," wrote a reviewer in the Halifax Chronical Herald. "The famous balcony scene, a highlight of this production, drew applause on opening night."

Waxman has also taken roles in Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, Midsummer Night's Dream, Two Gentlemen of Verona, Richard III and the comic improvised sketches of Shakespeare's Clowns. The "Shakespeare by the Sea" productions run successively until Sept. 12.

He has dedicated all his performances to his father, the late Al Waxman and his mother, Sara Waxman.

Names in the News: Ontario Jewish playwright Jodi Miller is author of the play Playing, which premieres this month at the Edinburgh Festival 2004.

Playing is about a newly cohabiting couple who run out of conversation and embark on a voyage of sexual discovery, but find it's harder than they thought to transform their relationship through sex. Miller's previous award-winning play, Vladeck, a production part of which was filmed and aired on MTV Muchmusic, is being made into a full-length feature film. Miller has been commissioned to write the screenplay. After Edinburgh, her play Playing transfers to the Arundel Fringe festival in West Sussex, England.

CANADIANS RETURNING TO ISRAEL IN DROVES

During the first six months of 2004, Canadian tourism to Israel was up 69 per cent over 2003 and 70 per cent over 2002, according to a report from Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics and the Tourism Ministry.

By the end of June 2004, Israel welcomed more than 20,000 Canadian visitors, compared to 11,500 during the same period in 2003.

"We expect that an estimated 1.4 million tourists will visit Israel this year. This positive upward trend should continue, as tour groups from Canada and around the world really discover the country's treasures," said Dani Shahal, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto.

Similarly large increases in tourism to Israel were reported from France, the United States, Great Britain, Russia, Germany, Singapore and Korea.

Rochester Package: Four Rochester-area museums have joined together to offer a package for Canadian visitors called Museums of the American Experience.

The four museums are the Genesee Country Village & Museum, a reconstructed 19th-century village; the George Eastman House, a colonial revival mansion built by the founder of Kodak in 1902; the National Women's Hall of Fame in Seneca Falls; and the Susan B. Anthony House, home of America's most famous suffragist.

The Canadian Roadtripper package offers a variety of suggested itineraries. The three-day package includes accommodations for two nights in one room and admission to all four museums. The price is $139 (Canadian) per adult, $19 per child under 18. It's being offered through Oct. 31, depending on availability. 800-834-2216.

A week of New Yiddish Culture

Ashkenaz is back.

The Festival of New Yiddish Culture returns to Harbourfront, Toronto from Aug. 31 to Sept. 6.

In that week, you can experience Ethiopian-Israeli-Canadian theatre, Argentine klezmer, Polish film, music from Holland and France, and international photography.

Generations can come together over Yiddish humour and bagels, discover history through papercutting, dance along with a French-Canadian Gypsy band or drum with Middle Eastern percussionists.

Some of the highlights are pianist Marilyn Lerner performing her original score for the 1923 silent comedy East and West. Film fanatics are offered a rare opportunity for comparison and contrast when the film is re-screened with improvised music by Klezmer en Buenos Aires.

Local and international klezmer acts such as the Pomegranate Squad, Beyond the Pale, Khupe, Klezmatics Ot Azoj, Hu Tsa Tsa , Stempenyu's Dream and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band are just some of the musical highlights.

For movie buffs, there are lots of classic Yiddish movies including The Golem (1936) and the musical gem The Singing Blacksmith (1939).

Theatre afficionados will thrill to such diverse offerings as The Yiddish Radio Hour and the one-man show S'brent, It Burns, based on the stories of Shalom Aleichem.

There's also a series of lectures, a literary program, visual arts and special events for children.

Ruth Gruber's Haven released on DVD with little fanfare

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

It is fascinating how some films and videos seem to fly under the radar. They get lost in the shuffle and are never released theatrically or are given only a limited release before finding their way onto video and DVD.

Even then, some titles are released on video so quietly that no one knows they are available. Recently, I came across several of those videos.

Haven is the true story of Ruth Gruber's attempts to provide sanctuary in the United States for some 1,000 Holocaust survivors. It is a heart-rending television mini-series, produced by Alliance Atlantis, here in Toronto, and was telecast throughout North America in February 2001.

Ever since then, I have been watching for Haven's release on home video. Last May, this title was released with little fanfare or notice, and I only became aware of it when I spotted the DVD in a local music store. Even some of my favourite video specialty stores knew nothing about the title or its recent release. As a result, few stores have stocked it and even fewer people know it's available.

Gruber was a special assistant to former secretary of the interior Harold Iches during World War II. In 1944, Iches asked Gruber to fly to Naples and escort a group of refugees, most of whom were Jewish, to the United States. It was a rare humanitarian gesture by the Roosevelt administration.

The mini-series follows the refugees on the voyage across the Atlantic and to their temporary settlement at a former army base in Oswego, N.Y. The refugees lived there for 18 months while Gruber fought to have them given more freedom to leave the camp and to allow them to remain in the U.S. after the war.

The TV movie stars Natasha Richardson as Gruber, Colm Feore, Henry Czerny, Bruce Greenwood and Sheila McCarthy, with special appearances by Anne Bancroft and Martin Landau as Gruber's parents.

It should be pointed out that the description on the back of the DVD box is incorrect. It says there were 100 survivors. The group saved by Ruth Gruber actually numbered about 1,000.

Haven can be found at some video and music stores or can be ordered by them. The video or DVD, on the Alliance Atlantis label, can also be ordered through the Internet at www.amazon.ca.

A second DVD release few people know about is Dummy, a film that appeared at the Toronto International Film Festival last September and then disappeared. It was scheduled to be released theatrically in Toronto earlier this year, but problems cropped up and it came out on video in February.

Dummy, on the Alliance Atlantis label, features Adrien Brody as Steven Schoichet, a young Jewish man who lives at home with his strange parents and sister. He has a dead-end job and life is not very promising, until he decides to become a ventriloquist. He buys a dummy and begins working the small-time comedy circuit.

Adrien Brody and Milla Jovovich star in Dummy.

This is a funny, romantic comedy. It is not a brilliant film, by any means, but is certainly worth watching, if only for Brody's performance.

The film has an impressive cast, including Milla Jovovich, Illeana Douglas, Vera Farmiga, Jessica Walter, Ron Leibman and Jared Harris. Those interested in the film can find it on video or DVD. Check with your local video store or go to www.amazon.ca.

Finally, a film starring Al Pacino was recently released on video. People I Know, also on the Alliance Atlantis label, has been in the can for quite some time and finally received a limited theatrical release.

It tells the story of a burnt-out Jewish press agent whose clientele has practically disappeared. In an effort to promote civil liberties and improved black and Jewish relations, he sponsors a benefit evening and tries to induce the movers and shakers from both communities to attend.

The film loses its way quickly as the emphasis shifts to drugs and murder. As a result, it's easy to see why the film received little attention, but for those interested, it is now available on video and DVD.

South Africa's Garden Route a sensual feast

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

There are plenty of sights to see and things to do on South Africa's coastal Garden Route, which stretches from the Eastern Cape's Port Elizabeth, once a small British settlement on the Indian Ocean, to Cape Town, the country's capital in the Western Cape.

A great way to start off your Garden Route journey after your long trip from Canada to Port Elizabeth is with a safari and spa experience. Just slightly more than an hour off the route toward East London is a private oasis called Shamwari Game Reserve. It offers a number of luxury accommodation options, including the Bayethe Tented Lodge.

I was scheduled to stay at the Eagles Cragg lodge, but was bumped in order to accommodate actor John Travolta and his large entourage. The Shamwari reserve boasts two spas, including the Lobengula Lodge, which offers an array of esthetic treatments, including romantic couples' massages, both in-room and outdoors. (Golfer Tiger Woods became betrothed at the lodge – must have been a good massage!)

Back on the Garden Route leaving Port Elizabeth, I enjoyed the spectacular foliage that includes more than 22,000 species, with 10,340 types of daisies and 150 different geraniums.

We travelled over the Stormsriver Bridge to the Tsitisikamma National Coastal Park, the only coastal park in the country. Here, bird life is abundant and you can see it first-hand, along with lots of other wildlife during a Stormsriver Adventure tour such as blackwater tubing or mountain biking.

You might also try a canopy tour, which sounds innocent enough until you realize what it means – gliding 30 metres above the forest floor in a cabled harness from one tree top platform to another. The operators swear that octogenarians have enjoyed the experience, but for people who have sore backs or are just plain chicken, a tandem ride with a guide is advised.

Continuing on the Garden Route, you will come to Knysna, a charming seaside town that attracts the rich and famous of South Africa and Europe. A great way to see the famous Knysna Heads, the two cliffs at the entrance to the Knysna laguna, is from the water, be it in a rented canoe or motorboat, or in a sunset paddleboat cruiser.

Many artisans have been drawn to Knysna because it is surrounded by forest, water and mountains. Ask the locals about George Rex, who came to the area in 1804 and founded the town. Rex is reputed to be the illegitimate son of George III of England, and his first born. If this is true, it means the real British royal family lives on the beaches of Knysna, not in Buckingham Palace.

Leaving Knysna, travellers have a choice of staying on the coastal highway and passing farmland or heading toward Cape Town on the scenic route through the Outeniqua Pass to the Klein Karoo, a narrow semi-desert adorned by river valleys.

In the Klein Karoo, you will find the town of Oudtshoorn, the world capital of the ostrich industry. You can actually go on a guided tour at the Safari Ostrich Farm and sit on one of these not-so-friendly critters. You can even ride one, if you dare.

Oudtshoorn, a town in the Klein Karoo, has a synagogue at 83 Baron van Reede St. Built in 1888 by architect George Wallis, it includes a Hebrew school and rabbi's house. Up the road is the museum, which has an Israeli flag hanging outside and a miniature replica of the town's synagogue inside.

Other attractions in the area include the Cango Wildlife Ranch, where for an extra fee you can pet a cheetah, and the Cango Caves, a series of limestone caverns below the mountains of the Swartberg Range.

On the road to Cape Town, you will pass through Worcester and come across Kibbutz El Shammah. Built by Israelis, it's the only kibbutz in South Africa. Next en route is the famous Winelands, including Paarl and Stellenbosch, the second-oldest town in South Africa, which is famous for its university, historic buildings and imported oak trees that line the streets.

Also in the region is Franschoek, where the Huguenots – French Protestants – settled in the 17th century after fleeing persecution in Europe.

Getting to your Garden Route holiday is easy, although it's a long trip. South African Airlines flies from New York to Johannesburg and offers frequent domestic connections to Port Elizabeth.

Kathryn Kates was a guest of TOPAC (Tour Operators Promoting Africa in Canada), South African Tourism and South African Airways. For more information on South African holidays, contact TOPAC at 416-591-7783 or visit www.topac.org.

A sober examination of contemporary anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ron Rosenbaum, the editor of Those Who Forget the Past: The Question of Anti-Semitism (Random House Canada), admits that the longest hatred flummoxes him.

"After nearly two decades of reading the literature of anti-Semitism, I have yet to find a satisfactory explanation for its persistence," he acknowledges in the introduction. "Not a single-pointed answer, anyway."

Rosenbaum, whose previous book was Explaining Hitler, an exploration of his twisted psyche, delves into religious and racial-based anti-Semitism. But he comes to no definite conclusions. "The explanations multiply and contradict one another," he writes.

Having reached a dead end, he throws up his hands in exasperation and observes, "The reasons, the origins, no longer matter. At this point, anti-Semitism has become so embedded in history... that it will always be there... "

The fact that anti-Semitism is an enduring and generational phenomenon gives Rosenbaum a licence to examine it under a microscope.

He does so in Those Who Forget The Past, a bracing collection of essays that deal with all facets of anti-Semitism.

Rosenbaum's lengthy introductory essay sets the tone.

He claims that the Internet is the "new frontier" of contemporary anti-Semitism, which blends traditional forms of anti-Semitism with antagonism toward Zionism and Israel.

On the web, a surfer will inevitably stumble upon Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the malign Russian forgery whose impact on the Arab world is more keenly felt since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States and the multiplicity of anti-Semitic conspiracy theories they hatched.

The first essayist, Jonathan Rosen, an American novelist and journalist, confronts this problem head-on by stating that European anti-Semitism has joined hands with Arab anti-Israel propaganda and found a home in Muslim lands.

In her essay, Canadian columnist Barbara Amiel, citing a notorious incident in which a French ambassador described Israel as "that shitty little country," while casting aspersions on Jews, warns that open expressions of anti-Semitism have made a comeback in respectable European circles.

Addressing the widely believed myth that the Mossad planned the Sept. 11 atrocities, Harold Evans, the former editor of the London Sunday Times, says, "The story got legs because it fitted the story line of Jewish masterminds and because very few people in the media regarded it seriously enough to take note of, still less, eviscerate."

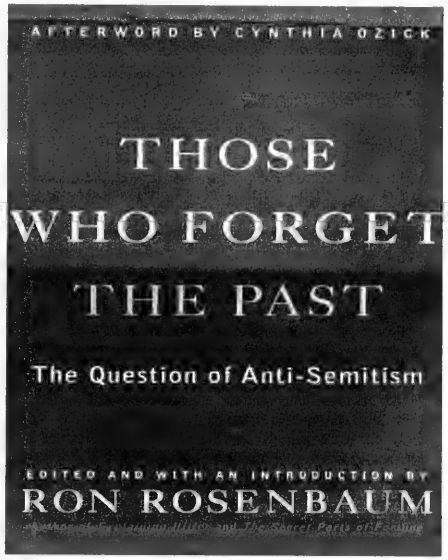
Evans correctly rejects legitimate criticism of Israel as being synonymous with anti-Semitism.

But it is easy to cross the line, he suggests.

"It is anti-Semitic to vilify the state of Israel as a diabolical abstraction, reserving tolerance for the individual Jew but not the collective Jew. It is anti-Semitic to invent malignant outrages. It is anti-Semitic to consistently condemn in Israel what you ignore or condone elsewhere. It is, above all, anti-Semitic to dehumanize Judaism and the Jewish people, so as to incite and justify their extermination."

Lawrence Summers, the president of Harvard University and the former U.S. secretary of the treasury, levels a formidable accusation.

"Serious and thoughtful people are advocating and taking actions that are anti-Semitic in their effect, if not their intent," he charges in a reference to attempts to single out Israel for divestment.



AFTERWORD BY CYNTHIA OZICK
THOSE WHO FORGET THE PAST
The Question of Anti-Semitism
EDITED AND WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY RON ROSENBAUM

Robert Wistrich, a Hebrew University professor of history who has devoted his career to the study of anti-Semitism, contends that "a culture of hatred" permeates the Arab world in a way that has not been seen since the heyday of Nazi Germany.

The Arab-Israeli conflict is but a contributory factor, he believes. "The ideological anti-Semitism that characterizes Islamic thinking is driven by... an irrational belief that history itself is determined by the evil machinations of the Jewish people. In this respect, the Islamists seem to be directly following the Nazi model, with its fixation on a mythical Jewish power that strives for global hegemony."

According to Wistrich, Islamic fascists and Nazis share several traits: militarism, the glorification of force and a nihilistic cult of death.

Anti-Jewish rhetoric in our new millennium tends to be Islamic, anti-globalist and neo-Marxist rather than Christian, conservative or neo-fascist, he adds.

In a similar vein, Gabriel Schonfield, senior editor of Commentary, the neo-conservative American magazine, observes that the venomous language used against Jews and Israel these days is drawn from "the vocabulary of the Holocaust."

Leon Wieseltier, the literary editor of The New Republic, urges readers to be careful about assessing anti-Semitic threats.

The conflation of the Palestinians with the Nazis is grotesque, he says. In a reference to the 2002 suicide bombing in Netanya that killed 30 civilians, he writes, "Only a fool could believe that the Passover massacre was a prelude to the extermination of the Jews of Israel; a fool, or a person with a particular point of view about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Ruth Wisse, a Harvard professor of Yiddish and comparative literature, takes a harder line.

As she puts it: "Anti-Zionism has absorbed all the stereotypes and foundational texts of fascist and Soviet anti-Semitism and applied them to the Middle East. Every stratum of Arab society, from top to bottom, has been nourished on the myth of Israel's illegitimacy, and has been encouraged to express its loyalties through aggressive hostility to the Jewish people and its land."

Furthermore, she writes, Arabic translations of major works of European anti-Semitism have been supplemented by a new body of original literature defaming Israel and the Jews.

Fiamma Nirenstein, an Italian journalist, claims that Israel has been transformed into "the classic evil Jew."

Echoing Rosenbaum, Simon Schama, a professor of art history at Columbia University, writes: "We certainly shouldn't be surprised that [anti-Semitism] has... survived both the reasonings of modernity and the testimony of history."

In a bleak warning, Schama urges Jews not to underestimate the power of anti-Semitic websites.

"If there's anything we've learned from this peculiarly delusional moment in our history, it is that today's media fantasy may indeed turn into tomorrow's cultural virus."

The American novelist and essayist Cynthia Ozick has the last word. "Anti-Semitism feeds on itself from continent to continent. It scarcely requires Jews."

On this pessimistic but realistic note, Those Who Forget the Past comes to a sober close.

225 INVESTMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Apartment & Sixplex Owners: Better to pay capital gains than have vacancies of 10%!

Vacancies are sharply up and take months to fill. Utilities and taxes are skyrocketing. A prudent investor must sell now. First time housing more affordable than ever. Don't get caught short. Legislation will change detrimentally next year. It is proposed that vacant units will no longer go for market rents. Sell now and profit by it while you can.

Future of Jews in Russia remains unclear

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

MOSCOW — In a tidy and cheerful building in central Moscow, children mill about, play with colourful toys, watch television, and dream about a life of normalcy, free from the abuse, drunkenness and neglect of their parents.

Described in English as an orphanage, its Hebrew name, Beit Yeladim (children's house), more accurately represents its nature. Housing 40 youngsters ranging in age from four to 18, the two-year-old home is a refuge from a life that for many kids was one of unrelieved horror.

Beit Yeladim's director, Dany Belak, and his wife, Yael, serve as surrogate parents for the children, who look to other residents as their brothers and sisters.

Belak, 29, a native of Dniepropetrovsk, said most of the children in the facility had lived in desperate circumstances. "Each story is a horrific story," he said. "There are still parts of the Jewish population that lives in conditions that Jews in the West don't understand."

The examples he cites are chilling. About four years ago, a desperate grandmother approached Rabbi Yitzchok Gorelik in Kazan, asking for advice about her grandchildren. Her daughter, she said, lived in Nazer Badneh, a small town near the Tatar capital, and the condition of her grandchildren appalled her. Her daughter had been abandoned by her Russian peasant husband and she had turned to the sex trade to make ends meet. Her children lived on straw strewn on the floor, were barely fed and subsisted on berries they picked themselves and scraps from garbage bins. The mother numbed her hungry children to sleep by feeding them alcohol.

Since that meeting, the oldest boy, nine-year-old Natan, has been adopted by a Moscow Jewish family, while his sister resides in the Beit Yeladim.

Other children have similarly horrific stories to tell. Belak points to two brothers, Dany and Ilyusha, six and seven respectively, who arrived in the home from a state orphanage. An older brother has already been placed with a family, while the younger sister will move into Beit Yeladim next year when she is old enough.

Their non-Jewish father was often drunk and abusive. He beat their mother, once even stabbing her, and broke his children's teeth.

Removed to Beit Yeladim, the boys "couldn't speak and were completely confused with fear," Belak said. "They never smiled. Every time something fell, they blamed themselves. They had stomach, gastro-intestinal problems."

Neither of the boys saw a piece of fruit until they moved to Moscow. After about one month, they began "normalizing," he said.

Aided by a psychologist and supported by the love of the Belaks, the boys began to make progress. Today, Ilya speaks fluent Hebrew, while Dany is advancing at a somewhat slower pace, Belak said.

Were it not for the Beit Yeladim, "more of the children would be in the street," he added.

Beit Yeladim is one of 10 homes like it across the former Soviet Union (FSU). Altogether 500 Jewish kids reside in the homes – many from isolated communities – and there are plans for 10 additional facilities to be opened in the next two years. Russian oligarch Roman Abramovich has been one of the facilities' benefactors, while Chabad Lubavitch provides the programming.

The orphanages are part of a vast network of new Jewish facilities established across the FSU by the Chabad Lubavitch movement, said Rabbi Avraham Berkowitz, executive director of the Federation of Jewish Communities (FJC), an umbrella organization of Chabad-related Jewish organizations created in 1998.

They are symptomatic of a renewal of Jewish life in the FSU that followed the collapse of the communist regime. A window of opportunity exists today to revitalize Jewish life and Chabad has moved into Russia to take advantage of the opportunity, he said.

Fifty summer camps are being prepared for 10,000 youngsters, Jewish schools are opening in centres large and small and in Moscow and St. Petersburg, home to the largest Jewish communities, and religious and cultural life is blossoming, he said.

In Moscow, the $12 million (all figures US) Jewish Community Centre (JCC), which houses the Marina Roche Synagogue, reopened with much fanfare, as Russian President Vladimir Putin made a widely publicized appearance.

Synagogue in Moscow can hold 2,000 worshippers on High Holidays

The synagogue in the seven-storey building can accommodate 2,000 worshippers during the High Holidays. The building is also home to a 400-seat amphitheatre, an Internet cafe, administrative offices and a kosher restaurant.

Although the FJC relies on local philanthropists for support, much of their funding stems from two main sources, the Ohr Avner Foundation, created by Israeli businessman Lev Leviev, and the U.S.-based Rohr Family Foundation.

The two foundations were the primary sponsors of the $2.5-million purchase of the Spartak recreation centre in Moscow, which has been redeveloped as the Machon Chaya Mushka, a women's college and residence that is associated with Moscow State University and that offers degrees in Jewish studies.

St. Petersburg, Russia's second city, is home to an estimated 100,000 Jews. As in Moscow, the city now supports Jewish day schools, cultural centres, a home for the elderly, a soup kitchen and Jewish newspapers – a Jewish infrastructure unheard of only 15 years ago.

Yakov Tsukerman, editor of Ami, the first Jewish periodical to be established following the dissolution of the Soviet Union, said there are now 300 Jewish newspapers in the the republics of FSU.

St. Petersburg supports eight Jewish schools, including those operated by Chabad and the Jewish Agency. In addition, there are eight kindergartens, religious and secular, a Jewish university, cultural societies, and a Jewish museum.

A key issue facing the community is ameliorating the plight of pensioners, who subsist on $50 to $60 a month and rely on the soup kitchen and other assistance to get by, he said.

Pavel Felgenhauer is a Moscow-based columnist who specializes in military and strategic issues. Opinionated and cocky – something of a Russian Eric Margolis – Felgenhauer acknowledges that Jewish life has changed markedly over the past 14 years. In 1990 and '91, shortly after the Soviet Union broke up, the Chorale Synagogue in Moscow would attract not much more than 60 people, mostly elderly Russians and visiting foreigners. There were few families or young people, he noted, but if you attended services today, it and all Moscow synagogues are packed. "It's shocking," he said. "There were 17 seders in this building [the JCC]."

Steve Rosenberg, the BBC's Moscow correspondent since 1991, recounted a story of being shown a synagogue by a Russian visibly frightened to be seen near the place of worship. "Contrast that with now. It's amazing," he said. "Putin actually opened this community centre. That's a huge leap from what it was before."

With Putin's public signal, attitude to Jews has changed, Felgenhauer agreed. "It is a bit cool to be a Jew now, since Putin likes Jews."

The Chabad movement has drawn close to Putin, and one of Russia's chief rabbis, Berel Lazar, has been seen often with the Russian leader, even receiving the People's Friendship Medal.

Russia's other chief rabbi, Adolph Shayevitch, has the support of a rival organization, the Russian Jewish Congress, which was headed by oligarch Vladimir Gusinsky, a political opponent of Putin. While Chabad currently has the support of Putin, that situation could shift on a dime if there was a change of government, Felgenhauer said.

Beth Knobel, Moscow bureau chief for CBS, pointed out that Russia's 1993 constitution gave the president enormous unchecked powers.

"No one could see Putin coming," said Rosenberg, Knobel's husband. "No one knows who will be next."

Russia has no independent judiciary and parliament has a limited role, added Felgenhauer. Russia's "civil society" consists primarily of its bureaucracy, where policy is formulated and discussed. "There are a lot of people who are real anti-Semites in that bureaucracy. They know now that being an open anti-Semite is not good."

Many in that civil society don't like Jews and believe their Zionist masters on Wall Street want Russian assets, he said. "So when Putin moves against Jewish oligarchs, the bureaucrats say that's good, as they represent Jewish power."

Felgenhauer suggested Putin believes Chabad can be an asset to him as a lobbyist in the United States, perhaps in pushing for the removal of the Cold War-era Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which restricts trade with Russia.

Russia's influence on the Arab-Israeli conflict is negligible, with the country having limited leverage in the region. While many in the bureaucracy dislike Jews and Arabs equally, Russia's interests point the country to a more pro-Arab side, since it is believed "more money is to be made with that slant." Arabs are spending a lot of money to gain influence, Felgenhauer said.

Knobel suggested another attitude is at play. "Russians have a patriarchal attitude to Russians in Israel. They're still thinking about them… Russians refer to them as 'ours,' our people," she noted.

Paul Lungen was recently a guest of Chabad Lubavitch in Russia.

Canadian to officiate at Olympic tennis tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In 1999, at the tender age of 21, Brian Laski was invited to work the lines as an umpire at the most prestigious tournament in tennis, Wimbledon.

John McEnroe, who owned Wimbledon back in the 1980s, was already well past his prime and Laski was not able to savour the unique pleasures of having the left-handed phenom hurl a choice, "you can't be serious," at him.

Still, he did manage to officiate at a McEnroe match on the Seniors Tour, but that game passed uneventfully.

In his brief but storied career, Laski has seen some of the greats close up and sweaty. He has videotape of a match between Peter Sampras and Andre Agassi in Toronto where he worked as line umpire, and he worked as chair umpire in one of Patrick Rafter's last matches before he retired.

With that kind of experience, which also includes six U.S. Opens, it's a good bet that when he makes a call in Athens, it won't be because he's in awe of the players.

"Players do try to intimidate you so the next call is in their favour," he said prior to flying to Greece to officiate in the Olympics tennis competition. "But in tennis, the ball is moving so fast, you have no time to see whose shot it is."

Laski, now 26, has known since February that he'd been tagged to work as a line umpire in the Olympic tennis competition. For the past four years, international tennis officials have been screening prospective umpires, evaluating their performances and determining who would best perform in the pressure cooker of Athens.

To be considered for the Olympic umpire roster, Laski submitted his name to the International Tennis Federation, and Tennis Canada later endorsed his application.

Brian Laski

Based on his performance in each tournament he worked, and taking into account his top-15 finish among North American umpires in 1998 and 1999, when he worked the world doubles championships, Laski made the cut.

Tennis officials consider accuracy of calls, the absence of problems on the court and how well players respect you, Laski explained.

"I'm very excited," he continued. "It's a huge thrill, probably a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

Laski is not particularly nervous about the on-court competition. "It's the same players I've seen in other tournaments," he said.

In his brief but action-packed career, Laski has worked at six U.S. Opens, the Canadian Open, three Ontario university (OUAC) championships, Wimbledon, and numerous regional competitions.

As a youth, Laski enrolled in the Ontario Tennis Association's junior development program, "but I was never good enough to do very well." A multi-sport athlete, in 1991, he was on the Toronto team at the regional youth Maccabi Games in New Jersey, where he won two swimming silver medals in the individual medley relay and the freestyle relay.

In 1996, when he was 18, he applied to be a ball boy at the Canadian Open in Toronto. He was disappointed to be told he was too old for the job, "but they suggested an on-court position."

As Laski found out, tennis bodies, including the ATP and WTA, have been trying to recruit younger officials for the past 10 years. He signed up for a training seminar through Tennis Canada "and they stuck me on the court at a junior event at the Richmond Hill Country Club. I knew what to do… Officiating came easy."

After serving as line umpire at two or three regional events, he advanced right to the Canadian Open. At 18, he was making calls in the Open's qualifying tournament and for the first half of the tournament itself.

The alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto then went on to work 10 professional tournaments, including the U.S. Open in 1997 as a 19-year-old line umpire.

"I thought I was the youngest and I was shocked when I wasn't," he said.

To Laski's surprise, one of his colleagues was only 18.

Still, "as a student job, I couldn't find anything better. To travel, to get paid in U.S. dollars, it was pretty good."

He learned quickly that it's important to act professionally and assuredly. "If you don't sound confident, or you sound nervous, the players really eat that up."

While there are some chair umpires who make tennis a full-time career, Laski remains a part-timer. He is enrolled in the dentistry program at the University of Toronto and plans to graduate next year.

Iraqis say they won't avoid Israelis at Games

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iraqi athletes are ready to put politics aside and compete against Israeli opponents if the occasion arises at the Athens Olympics, the leader of the Iraqi delegation said in an interview published shortly before the Games began.

"I want to send a clear message to the Israeli people… It does not matter if you are Israeli, Palestinian or Iraqi, each one of us has the basic right to live," Iraqi Olympic committee president Ahmed al-Samarrai told Yediot Achronot. "We have no problem meeting the Israelis. This is sport, not politics," he said.

In past Olympics and other major sporting events, competitors from Arab countries have pulled out of clashes against Israelis.

Israeli wrestler Ya'akov Manshirov only made it to the Olympics after an Iraqi wrestler refused to fight him at the last world championship, giving him a bye to the quarterfinals and a ticket to Athens.

36 Israeli athletes embark on quest for medal glory

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ATHENS — Judoka Arik Ze'evi, perhaps Israel's best hope for a gold medal, was given the honour of carrying the country's flag at the opening ceremonies of the 2004 Olympic Games in Athens last week.

Ze'evi, a three-time European champion in the under-100-kilogram category, marched at the head of an Israeli delegation that is widely considered the best the country has ever sent to the Games.

A total of 36 Israeli athletes in 15 disciplines are competing in the Games, and Israel Olympic chairman Ephraim Zinger expects the delegation to bring home three medals, including a first-ever gold.

Since it first competed at the 1952 Helsinki Games, Israel has won a total of four medals. Judoka Yael Arad was the first to claim honours for Israel with a silver in 1992 in Barcelona. Oren Smadja added bronze in the men's judo event.

Gal Friedman claimed bronze four years later in Atlanta in the mistral surfboard, and Michael Kalganov earned Israel's latest medal, a bronze in the 1,000-metre kayak in Sydney four years ago.

Friedman and Kalganov are once again expected to challenge for medals, with the windsurfer marked as one of Israel's gold medal hopefuls along with Ze'evi, Greco-Roman wrestler Gocha Tsitsiashvili and pole vaulter Alex Averbukh.

Veteran shooter Alex Danilov was the first to go for Israel last Saturday, competing in the qualifiers of the 50-metre pistol. He was hoping to erase the memory of his early disqualification in Sydney with a place in the finals later the same day.

Next in action was swimmer Vered Borochovsky in the qualifying heats of the 100-metre butterfly. Borochovsky, who also competed in the 200-metre individual medley, said her aim was to break the Israeli record and, with a bit of luck, gain a place in the final.

Other Israeli athletes include judoka Gal Yekutiel, gymnast Pavel Gofman and women's table tennis player Marina Kravchenko. World and European bronze medalists Nika Kornitzky and Vered Buskila are vying for Olympic medals in the women's 470 class double-handed dinghy.

In the men's 470 event, Gidi Klieger and Udi Gal, the 2001 European silver medalists, also began their quest for glory on Saturday. Since winning the European silver, Klieger and Gal came close to medals at both the European and world championships, but failed to mount the podium on each occasion.

Last Thursday, 11 of the Israeli athletes who had yet to arrive in Athens joined their teammates after an early morning flight from Tel Aviv. The athletes had an unpleasant surprise when the terminal was evacuated after a bomb scare, but it failed to dampen their spirits.

Tennis double pair Any Ram and Yoni Erlich were upbeat about their chances of pulling off a surprise in Athens. "We are in great shape and have had some fantastic results in the past month," said Ram. At the Tennis Masters event in Toronto earlier in the month, the duo advanced to the doubles quarterfinals.

Our kinship to one another is what bonds us

Dear God,

I went to Israel and stood before the holiest sites in the history of Judaism and felt dead. I stood before ruins that are thousands of years old and witnessed the tragedy and survival of my people – the Jewish people – have experienced, and I felt nothing. Not a stir in my stomach, not a flutter in my heart, nor an ache in my soul. God, what happened?

BY SANDIE BENITAH

I am a Sephardi Jew living in Ashkenazi Toronto. That means that all my life I've always been the "good one" to my secular friends, turning down Friday night parties for Shabbat dinners and turning away cheeseburgers for fish. I listen to You, I believe in You and I talk to You. And yet, it was those same secular friends who felt touched to their core when they touched the Western Wall in awe, while I stood there and didn't shed a single tear. God, where were you?

But really, where was I?

I was on a 12-day organized tour of the country with about 40 other young Jewish Canadians. It was my first time in Israel and I thought this would be a great way to experience it. So many of my friends who came back from a similar trip raved about the spiritual awakening they experienced. "I'll never date a non-Jewish boy again," one of them pledged.

God, I'm so jealous.

Let's face it. It's been awhile now that I've been starving for a spiritual kick in the butt to make me head in the right direction. I'm at an age where I should be settling down. Being Jewish and raising a proud Jewish family is what I want. It's important to me, but my friends have yet to hear me pledge anything.

You didn't fail me. I failed myself.

It's true that I went to Israel with high expectations for an enriching learning experience. Instead, I found myself immersed in mindless fun, laughing with roommates all night long and dancing with everyone. But although I was surrounded by Jewish people and Jewish life, I kept looking for something more, something deeper. I was looking for something that would make me serious about my religion. It never came.

What kept coming to me was a single question – What does it mean to be Jewish? I always believed it meant taking an interest in the Torah and making a connection with the religion.

A friend once told me that it was important to distinguish between the religion and the people who represent the religion. I thought he was so smart, but now, in retrospect, I think he's a fool. Without Jewish culture, secular or not, the Jewish people would have no pride, and our religion would be meaningless. Much of the Torah is about honouring our history and our plight as a people. We celebrate Passover to remember our suffering at the hands of others. We celebrate Shabbat to reflect on the holiness that has always marked our people. Religion isn't what bonds us, our kinship to one another does.

I'll always remember one Friday night of our trip, when, after some coaxing, the guys put on their kippot and sang, rather than recited, the Kiddush. There it was, the flutter in my heart. Who would have guessed that my spiritual kick in the butt would come while staring at the faces of my most secular friends?

It hurts that I no longer have the bragging rights about being the "good" Jew in our group. They've had it right all along, God, and going to Israel is what made me stand up and take notice.

YOM TOV CHOCOLATE HONEY CAKE

1/2 cup sifted flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
6 oz. semi-sweet chocolate
2 eggs
6 tblsps. honey
1 tblsp. vanilla
1 cup chopped nuts (optional)
1/3 cup butter

Sift together all dry ingredients. Melt chocolate and butter, then cool. Beat in eggs, one at a time. Beat in honey and vanilla. Stir in dry ingredients and nuts.

Butter an 8"x8" pan. Bake at 375°F for 30 minutes, making sure to test for doneness. Top with whipped cream.

About Life

Dear Ella,

About seven months ago my husband and I adopted a beautiful little girl from China. We already have a five-year-old son, but having another biological child was not possible, so we adopted Emily.

The problem is my parents. They now have six grandchildren, including Emily, but they act like they only have five. I know that her being Asian is an issue. They don't want to have to explain this grandchild to their friends.

At family gatherings they ignore Emily. They hug and kiss and play with all the other kids, but avoid her. Nobody has really noticed yet, except for my husband and me, but soon the other kids will notice, and, worst of all, so will Emily.

They can't treat her like this, I won't allow it. What's my next step?

Acceptance Please

Dear Acceptance Please

Mazel tov on your new little daughter. Bringing an Asian child into a Caucasian family can have its challenges as well as its rewards.

We always look for and expect support from our own families. Not having the support of your parents is difficult. There are still people who believe only a genetic relationship is valid.

You and your husband have made a major decision to make Emily part of your family. You have opened up your lives and your hearts to her, and you are reaping the rewards on a daily basis. Unfortunately, you can't expect everyone to feel the way you do.

Your parents need time to really get to know Emily on a one-to-one basis. They will see that Emily is developing similar talents, tastes and interests as their other grandchildren. Given that time, she is bound to win them over. They need the chance to interact with her regularly. This will help them get past the newness of the situation and the fear of explaining her to their friends. Once they clear that hurdle, it will give them the opportunity to concentrate on Emily, rather than on what their friends will say.

You schedule the times and let Emily do the rest. Have faith in your parents and in the abilities of your little girl.

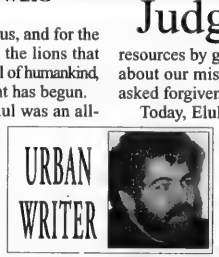
Judgment in the month of Elul

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The month of Elul is upon us, and for the ants that walk our sidewalks, the lions that amble through the jungles, and all of humankind, the process of divine judgment has begun.



When I was in yeshiva, Elul was an all-encompassing month of introspection. We would wake up early in the morning and say special tfillot – Slichot – sometimes an hour or more before regular davening. I recall how ominous the days felt, as though we had grown wings so we could fly closer to God and a silky and finely woven cover of beauty had wrapped itself around us.

We sensed the holiness in the air. I think in images and recall seeing God open the gates of heaven just a tad more than usual, for our prayers to slip through and reach her ears. We prayed fervently. We heard the shofar. We reached deeper into our meagre allowances to do what Judaism says is just – sharing our resources by giving tzedakah. We wondered about our misdeeds of that year and freely asked forgiveness of those we hurt.

Today, Elul is different. I am 44 and am no longer surrounded by the consistent reminders of this month. I have great difficulty with prayer and wonder incessantly about praising God after witnessing unforgivable suffering. The task of asking slichah – forgiveness – is now so much harder, because humbling myself as an adult collides with my ego much more so than when I was young and saying sorry was simpler.

But Elul is still ominousness and I can sense the shift in consciousness when it arrives, as I still do when Friday becomes Shabbat. And my chest still puffs out with the pleasure of a farmer completing his harvest every time I hear the sound of the shofar.

What a superb tradition. How interesting that we use this ancient instrument, as Joshua did when he entered Israel, to physically and spiritually wake up our people.

If you live near a shul, listen very carefully in the morning. Hear the call of the shofar, because it is mighty, bold and brash. It is universal, historical and futuristic.

Last year, I led the High Holy Day services at the Danforth Jewish Circle. One of the highlights of the services was a shofar duo between Richard Chardash, a founding member, and myself.

I put my tallit over my head, and Richard and I established fierce eye contact, knowing we were the congregation's spiritual musicians, blowing a song that had been played in the desert following the Exodus, in the Temples in Jerusalem and in Europe when Jewish communities thrived with erudition and brilliance.

It's Elul. If used wisely, it will make your Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur richer and more meaningful. Use it. Be courageous and ask forgiveness of those you hurt, regardless of how bad your misdeed was. Life is so short. Be generous with the funds that God has advanced us and exaggerate the amount of tzedakah you give because Judaism says it is just – not right or good, but just. Look deeply into your own neshamah (soul), and forgive your foibles and craziness, and celebrate the beauty and greatness that lies within you as creations of God.

Elul begins Aug. 18. Make it rock!

"I am often overcome... [that] we are building castles of sands and any moment a wave will come and wipe out everything. But God who is there, after man sins... whispers in our ear that Jerusalem is surrounded by mountains – one must do much climbing... to climb the mountain so as to be able to reach Jerusalem.

– Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik

Arsonists attack community centre in Paris

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Arsonists burned a Jewish community centre in eastern Paris before dawn Sunday, leaving behind graffiti with anti-Semitic messages such as "Jews get out," police said.

No one was hurt as flames tore through the centre located on the first floor of a six-storey building. The centre, a meeting place and cafeteria for the elderly and disadvantaged, was gutted, rescue officials said.

Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin and other top officials visited the centre, the latest target in a years-long wave of anti-Jewish attacks in France.

"I came here today to say that France cannot accept a trivialization of anti-Semitism," Raffarin said.

He noted that the maximum sentence for such crimes is 20 years behind bars. "Prosecutors will request the maximum sentences," he promised.

In a statement, President Jacques Chirac condemned the attack and pledged solidarity with the Jewish community. The government is "determined to find the perpetrators of this unacceptable act so that they can be tried and convicted with the greatest severity" that the law allows, Chirac said.

Firefighters were called to the scene at about 3:30 a.m. local time and had extinguished the flames by early morning. The centre's wooden doors were gnawed by flames, while the walls inside were blackened. The apartments upstairs were not affected.

Killers Denied Parole

TORONTO — The two men who killed Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski in 1999 were denied parole earlier this month by the Ontario Parole and Earned Release Board. It said the behaviour of Meir Mariani and William Cochrane, both 21, had declined and both smoked pot while in jail, even after completing drug abuse programs. They were convicted of manslaughter for killing Baranovksi, 15, in a dispute over cigarettes in a park. They were sentenced last December to two years less a day after getting eight years credit for four years in pre-trial custody. They became eligible for parole after serving one-third of the time.

Schwartz Drops Bid

TEL AVIV — Gerald Schwartz, chairman and CEO of Toronto-based Onex Corp., has dropped the bid he was leading through Onex to buy a majority stake in the Israel Discount Bank (IDB) from the Israeli government, which owns 57 per cent of Israel's third-largest bank. Schwartz backed away because of demands by U.S. regulators that Onex restructure its U.S. holdings if it wants to acquire Israel Discount Bank of New York, the business newspaper Globes reported. Schwartz and fellow Canadian Matthew Bronfman were named last month as two of the five foreigners bidding for IDB.

Graves Vandal Held

PARIS — A man has admitted to vandalizing some 60 Jewish tombstones with swastikas and Nazi symbols in Lyon earlier this month. The French national is in custody after giving himself up on Aug. 14. Police said he may have daubed the stones as part of an initiation rite linked to a U.S.-based far-right group that requires members to commit a "Phineas Act," often of a violently racist or anti-Semitic nature. The man said he was the mysterious figure who painted "Phineas" on three stones and attacked a Muslim in a Lyon suburb.

Missionaries Target D.C.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Jews for Jesus is bringing 600 volunteers to the Washington, D.C.-area to win converts among the city's 220,000 Jews. The "Behold Your God" campaign was to begin Saturday and end after Rosh Hashanah. Since 2001, it has targeted 38 other cities worldwide that have more than 25,000 Jews, including Toronto.

Final Deadline for Property Claims

LONDON — Britain has set an Aug. 31 deadline for remaining claims to the Enemy Property Claims Assessment Panel. Later claims will be assessed on an ad hoc basis.

The panel was set up in 1999 to receive compensation claims for assets of victims of Nazi persecution confiscated by Britain during World War II. Under the "Trading With The Enemy" act, Britain confiscated assets of residents of enemy nations, including Nazi-occupied countries. Many were taken from people who became Nazi victims. After the war, assets were released to victims, but not all were returned.

To date, 1,121 claims have been filed and £16.2 million paid to 377 successful claimants worldwide.

For details and a database of confiscated assets, visit www.enemyproperty.gov.uk.

Aide Denies Charges

NEWARK — A former aide to James McGreevey has denied reports he is blackmailing the New Jersey governor, saying he isn't gay and only defended himself against McGreevey's advances. Golan Cipel, an Israeli who was McGreevey's homeland security adviser and later his liaison to the state's Jewish community, is suing McGreevey for sexual harassment. Earlier this month, McGreevey admitted to an affair with a man and resigned.

Reinstatement Upheld

PARIS — A French court earlier has upheld the reinstatement of two 11-year-old boys, described as being of North African origin, who were expelled for attacking a Jewish boy at Paris' prestigious Lycée Montaigne last year. The Education Ministry had appealed a lower court decision that reinstated the boys and awarded them damages for what it called exaggerated punishment. One was expelled for assault, while the other was expelled for assisting the attack and for anti-Semitism. But the appeals court said they shouldn't have been expelled without warning.

N.Z. Jews Honour Dead

WELLINGTON — Some 300 Jewish New Zealanders paid homage Aug. 15 to those buried in Wellington's Makara Cemetery, about a week after 113 headstones were toppled and a prayer hall destroyed by fire in a nighttime attack there. Meanwhile, activists at an Aug. 14 anti-racism meeting faced extremist protesters handing out anti-Israel placards outside the hall where they met. The extremists are members of the National Front, whose Oct. 23 rally is being countered by the anti-racists. Inside, some activists spoke out against the inclusion of New Zealand Jewish leader David Zwartz, saying Israel is a racist state.

CIJA officials look back on first year

Survey results shock officials

By PAUL LUNGEN.
Staff Reporter

In the lead up to the creation of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) slightly less than one year ago, leaders of the new advocacy organization commissioned a survey of Canadians' attitudes toward Israel and the Middle East. They were shocked when the results came in and showed Canadians were woefully ignorant about the State of Israel.

As CIJA co-chair Steven Cummings recalled, the polling showed that "Canadians did not understand that Israel was a democracy with an independent judiciary, [with] freedom of religion, women [had] full and equal rights and gays [had] full and equal rights."

Instead, they equated Palestinians and Israelis and placed equal blame on each party for the conflict between them.

In devising a strategy to address these findings, CIJA determined that education was the key and it would begin by targeting Canadian leaders – whether in politics, in non-governmental organizations or labour unions, as well as other opinion makers, Cummings said.

Steven Cummings

Brent Belzberg

Since implementing their strategy, CIJA's senior officials believe the long, hard struggle to turn the corner on public support for Israel is well underway, with a number of initiatives undertaken to inform Canadians about Israel's democratic nature. And they believe headway has been made in creating a more comfortable atmosphere on campus for Jewish students who support Israel.

In a review of CIJA's first year of activities, Cummings and CIJA co-chair Brent Belzberg said the organization had allocated substantial new sums to Jewish advocacy organizations and has invested many resources in bringing influential Canadians to visit Israel.

Despite the growing influence in Canadian politics of the expanding Mideastern population, the Jewish community can retain support in Ottawa by stressing Israel's shared values with Canada, said Belzberg.

CIJA's board, which consists of prominent Canadian businesspeople, "has the ear of those who make decisions," Belzberg said.

To build on those relationships, CIJA has funded a number of missions to Israel, including three consisting of corporate CEOs; it has sponsored meetings with newspaper editorial boards and corporate luncheons by Jerusalem Post editor Bret Stephens; it has met with senior political leaders; and it has provided Canadian Jews with the resources and information to enable them to intelligently make the case for Israel when they discuss the Middle East with colleagues.

Cummings said visitors to Israel immediately get a different impression of the conflict when they see the country first-hand and meet local experts. CIJA-sponsored missions are designed to introduce visitors to Palestinian Authority spokespeople, so visitors "do not feel they are being propagandized," he added.

Since it has been in operation, CIJA has more than doubled the number of individuals visiting Israel on missions.

What's more, said Belzberg, the leaders being taken to Israel are more influential than ever before. (Last spring, one of the CIJA-inspired missions was led by former Ontario premier Mike Harris and former Newfoundland premier Brian Tobin.)

More than $200,000 has been spent subsidizing the visits to Israel of campus leaders, said Belzberg, while CIJA has worked with the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the

Marvelling at artists

From the editor's desk

Most of us can more easily recognize art than define it. That, of course, is part of art's universal appeal: its exhilarating, highly personalized, even liberating, subjectivity.

Ludwig Lewisohn, the noted German-born American writer, novelist and essayist of the early 20th century, once wrote that "wherever deep experience attains intense expression, there is art."

Despite Lewisohn's mental acuity and legendary facility with words, this powerfully aphoristic statement is catchier than it is definitive, more anecdotal than it is prescriptive.

All of us, during the course of our lives, have deep experiences of one sort or another. And we are all capable of intense expression in one form or another. But the expression of those experiences do not necessarily yield art, per se. They may indeed yield memorable moments or pleasant keepsakes. But can we always define that as art?

In one sense, of course, Lewisohn was absolutely correct. Art is indeed always at the meeting place of experience and expression. And when we have the occasional good fortune of venturing upon such a meeting place, we marvel.

Tovah Feldshuh

We also marvel at the artists.

Recently, while in New York, I happened to gaze upon, marvel at, appreciate and be moved by the rare talents of two artists: Tovah Feldshuh and Amedeo Modigliani.

Feldshuh is currently starring in the play Golda's Balcony at the Helen Hayes Theatre in Manhattan.

The play is a compelling, one-person tour de force. Written by William Gibson, it tells the story of the founding of the State of Israel through the heroic, heart-breaking and very human life of Golda Meir.

Gibson deftly weaves the personal issues and crises of Golda's private life with the life-and-death policy issues and crises of Golda's public life as Labor party activist, cabinet minister and prime minister.

The play begins at the calamitous outbreak of the disastrous Yom Kippur War. Golda confronts and struggles with the horrible, nightmare possibility of the destruction of the state. The military quandaries are of a piece with the moral ones she faces.

From that foreboding, dark precipice of the Yom Kippur War, Golda recounts the details of her life from the early frightened days as a child hiding from the Cossacks in Russia, through her headstrong teenage years in Milwaukee, to the heady, idealistic days as a young pioneering Zionist.

Feldshuh forcefully lays bare the heart-wrenching agony of Golda's immense responsibility as prime minister during the war even as she sweeps us up into the swirling emotion of the larger-than-life epic that was Golda Meir. For an hour and half, Feldshuh commands the stage entirely by herself, a table and chair, a pitcher of water and the occasional cigarette her only props.

She brings us to tears and to laughter. She entertains and she educates, she inspires and she instructs. She reminds us of the great burdens that so many people have carried on our behalf. She makes us aware that, when all is said and done, the lines of history are carved by human hands into the stones we often cast at each other.

Feldshuh was superb.

Amedeo Modigliani

Some 50 blocks north of the theatre, at the Jewish Museum, I saw a remarkable art exhibit titled Modigliani: Beyond the Myth. The full range of the artist's work as a painter and sculptor was on display. Curator Mason Klein has compiled an arresting, eye-opening, provocative showing of the Italian Jewish artist.

The myth of Modigliani's life was actually grounded in fact, namely, that he was a wildly passionate, brooding, womanizing, penurious but ultimately brilliant artist. Many of us are familiar with Modigliani's sensuous, elegantly elongated portraits and paintings in stunning shades of ochre, orange, brown and other earthy hues.

However, Klein's exhibit and insightful accompanying text reveal much more about the artist. Klein offers a new view of Modigliani "as a secular Jewish artist through the filter of his Italian Sephardic heritage."

"I am Modigliani, Jew," the artist would often say to the people he met in Paris. Through the exhibition that Klein has curated, we feel as if the artist was also saying that to us. The exhibit comes to the Art Gallery of Ontario on Oct. 23.

Of those who are able to make experience and expression meet as art, Marc Chagall once wrote. "The artist must penetrate into the world, feel the fate of human beings, of peoples, with real love... One must be interested in the entire realm of life." After seeing Tovah Feldshuh perform on stage and Amedeo Modigliani perform with sculpture and with paint, I have no doubt of the truth of Chagall's manifesto. —MBD

Jewish Palestinian scholar calls for binational state

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jasmin Habib, an Israeli-born cultural anthropologist, has written a book that will doubtless draw sharp criticism from most Jews and Arabs.

"It's a book both communities will respond to in a way that's not necessarily sympathetic," she said last week in a reference to Israel, Diaspora, and the Routes of National Belonging, which the University of Toronto Press will publish in September.

The majority of Jews will find it discomforting and disagreeable because Habib adopts a post-Zionist position in which she calls for a binational state encompassing Israel and the territories.

Similarly, many Palestinians will reject her book because they will think it legitimizes the attachment of the Jewish people to Israel.

Habib, an assistant professor at Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo, will thus please neither side, finding herself somewhere in a twilight zone that is usually the lot of bicultural individuals like her.

A personable and articulate woman of 40, she is an anomaly, at once a Jew and a Palestinian, both an "insider and an outsider," as she puts it.

Habib's Jewish mother was born in Mandate Palestine. Her maternal grandmother escaped the horrors of the Holocaust, but the Nazis murdered almost her entire family.

Her father, a Greek Orthodox Palestinian, was born in Beit Shean. His family was displaced by the strife that convulsed Palestine in the wake of the 1947 United Nations partition plan. As a result of the fighting, the Habibs lost their property and became "internal refugees," first in Nazareth and then in Haifa.

Married in Cyprus in 1962, Habib's parents were members of Israel's Communist party, where they met. He was a cabinetmaker and she was a lawyer.

They decided to leave Israel after the 1967 Six Day War, having concluded that their children, Jasmin and her brother Rami, would not be able to lead "normal" lives in Israel.

"They didn't want us to suffer," said Habib, whose Israeli birth certificate and identity card classified her as a Jew.

Her father immigrated to Canada in 1969 and settled in Ottawa. Habib and her mother and brother followed three years later. She was six years old when she landed in Canada.

Since then, Habib, who speaks Hebrew better than Arabic, has returned to Israel practically every year to visit her relatives. Although she defines herself as a Jew and a Palestinian, she feels closer to her Jewish relatives

A graduate of Trent University, Habib began working on the book a decade ago, a year after the launch of the Oslo peace process. "It was a moment of creative dialogue between and among Jews and Palestinians in North America," she observed.

She conducted field work in Toronto, among other places, participating in public events at Jewish community centres, synagogues, libraries and schools. She also went on organized tours of Israel.

The topic was not exactly new to her. She had often discussed it with her parents and brother at home, and at Trent University, she discovered that her Jewish friends were deeply attached to Israel without particularly knowing too much about it.

In her book, she writes: "My underlying objective is to consider ways of thinking outside of – and perhaps even beyond – the dominant paradigms that link identity to territorial nationalism."

Habib acknowledges that her family's unconventional history infuses Israel, Diaspora, and the Routes of National Belonging.

She found that, for Diaspora Jews, Israel is "the unifying symbol" of Jewish survival. "Thus, when Diaspora Jews imagined Israel, they were also reflecting on their collective history and the continuity of their community, the nation of Jews."

She was frankly surprised by her findings. "I had mistakenly conceived of Diaspora Jews as mainly a political community, especially in the context of the Israel-Palestine conflict. I was unprepared for the strength of their emotional commitments to one another as Jews, as a collectivity."

Habib claims that their bond with Israel is emotional rather than exclusively territorial. "The territory itself meant less to them than the survival of their kin."

Which brings Habib to her post-Zionist proclivities.

Habib fervently believes that Israeli Arabs, a branch of the Palestinians, will never achieve full cultural and national equality as long as Israel defines itself as a Jewish state.

In a binational state, however, that would not necessarily be the case, said Habib, who has been influenced by Israeli Jewish academics and journalists such as Tom Segev and Amira Hass.

Speaking as a Jew, she said, "Do we need a space – Israel – to be exclusive to be safe? I don't think so."

Nor does she think that a two-state solution is the answer. "Israeli Arabs will always remain second-class citizens in a Jewish state."

Habib realizes that her advocacy of a binational state will win her few friends and admirers in the Jewish community. "I understand why people don't want to hear that."

But she argues that compelling demographic factors – namely Israel's one million-strong Israeli Arab minority, with its much higher birth rate – will not allow Israel to be a Jewish and a democratic state in the future.

"We are moving toward a binational state, whether we like it or not."

'Some progress,' no suspects in Ryerson hate case

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Police are "looking into some persons of interest" in their investigation of the recent anti-Muslim hate incidents at Ryerson University.

Det.-Sgt. Neil Corrigan of Toronto Police 51 division said that "there's been progress [in the case] to some extent," but there are no suspects. He would not comment further on any possible leads.

He said the police hate crimes unit is working with campus security to examine physical evidence, such as fingerprints, and reviewing the school's security tapes.

Letter-sized flyers purporting to be from Jewish groups, one of which called on Toronto Jews to "fight back against Muslims and Arabs who wish to cause harm to us," were discovered recently in prominent locations on campus.

"We ask Jews everywhere in Toronto not to be fearful of the Muslim parasites," the flyer says. "We ask that whenever you spot a Muslim no matter who it is, Man, Woman, Teenager, Black Muslim, that you beat them and cause harm to them. Kill these Islamic infidels and don't be ashamed to be a Jew."

The poster, which was signed by a previously unknown group calling itself the Full Blooded Israelis Brigades, concluded with the words "God is Great!"

After the flyers appeared, the Muslim Students' Association found a letter in its campus mailbox threatening the group's president, Ahmed Arshi.

Corrigan said he does not know if the perpetrators are from Ryerson. "The potential is that it is more likely someone from within the [university]… but there is no direct evidence for this."

He said the language used in the flyers "is being examined for any investigative lead. Obviously there's been a lot of comment on this because of some of the text of the messages."

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said "the language in no way suggests that these flyers would have been put up by Jews.

"We simply do not have the word 'infidels' in our lexicon. 'God is great' is not part of the Jewish lexicon. Jews just would not engage in this kind of language. I've never seen anything like that before," Farber said.

Campus security increased

"That's why I don't think it's someone from the Jewish community or from the Ryerson community. It's someone just stirring up trouble within the two ethnic communities, and they've failed because it's drawn us closer, not driven us apart."

Farber said "it was such an obvious and stupid attempt to pin it on Jews. It didn't carry any weight at all. Anyone who saw it knew it right away."

Another poster, signed by a group calling itself The FBC Ridaz, took responsibility for a June 23 incident in which the words "Die Muslims Die" and Stars of David were spray-painted on the walls of the school's multifaith room.

The group warns Muslim students that "we will continue to send messages and that this incident is only the first of many. We want to let them know that no Muslim student will be safe and that security isn't going to stop us."

Ryerson spokesperson Dana Yates said campus security and awareness efforts have been increased.

Two community information sessions organized by the school after the posters were found were "really good, supportive" meetings, Yates said.

"It was an opportunity for student groups and various offices on campus to come together with the Ryerson community. The main message was that this won't be tolerated and this won't divide the community."

She said about 50 students, staff and faculty attended the first session and about 35 came to the second.

Yates said the school's discrimination and harassment prevention office, which has ongoing campus campaigns, is "putting on an extra push" as a result of the recent incidents.

Ann Whiteside, a discrimination and harassment prevention officer at Ryerson, said the office is putting out a "Help Stop Hate" poster, as well as continuing to meet with student groups and planning various speakers to talk about conflict, culture and racism.

Whiteside said the purpose of the programs is to "maintain a work study environment that is positive for everybody – positive and respectful."

Whiteside also said a multifaith day is being organized for Sept. 15.

"Everybody's being really vigilant overall," she said. Students, staff and faculty are making sure to "keep their eyes open" in hallways and pay attention to school bulletin boards.

"This is a horrible thing that's happened in our community. But the student groups are right on the money in terms of their reaction."

Sounds of silence (1)

"But the small Israeli team – 36 athletes competing in 14 sports – was met with quiet so complete it was shocking." That was how Christie Blatchford of the Globe and Mail described the scene as the Israeli delegation entered the Olympic Stadium during the opening ceremonies two weeks ago in Athens.

It was heartbreaking and infuriating to read.

The Israelis deserved better. They deserved the respect accorded to all the athletes competing in the games.

But the response of the audience in Athens is typical of the responses of most audiences throughout Europe now where Israel is concerned. Israel has been vilified and demonized even in Athens, even under the glow of the supposedly universalist five-ring symbol. Rather than basking within the olympic ideal of athletics and fellowship, Israel has been tossed the jagged shards of the modern-day ostracon.

What the propaganda-soaked Europeans do not see, we must show them. And when they do not extend to the Israeli athletes civility and respect, we will.

Sounds of silence (2)

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported last Friday that the world governing body of judo declined to penalize Arash Miresmaeili, the Iranian athlete who refused to compete at the Olympics against his Israeli counterpart, Udi Vaks. Despite earlier pronouncements by Iranian officials that Miresmaeili would not fight Vaks on Aug. 15 because of Iran's political boycott of Israel, the International Judo Federation (IJF) accepted Miresmaeili's claim that he did not fight simply because he was overweight.

"As the IJF has no rule for penalizing overweight athletes, the IJF executive committee decided not to take any sanction against Arash Miresmaeili," the federation said in a statement.

No one has been fooled by the Iranian's pitiful ploy.

The shameless transparency of Miresmaeili's excuse was underscored by the equally shameless suggestion by the chairman of the Iranian Olympic delegation, Nassrollah Sajadi, that Miresmaeili ought to still receive the $150,000 prize reserved for all Iranian medal winners. Indeed Iran's president Mohammed Khatami praised Miresmaeili's inability to maintain his weight as heroic.

If the IJF is too craven to do the right thing, what about the International Olympic Committee (IOC)? Why have we not heard from them? Can they not see the truth? Can they not see that the integrity of the Games has been compromised?

In Washington, Senators Tom Daschle and Harry Reid have urged the IOC to strip the Iranian delegation of its credentials if it fails to rebuke Miresmaeili.

Similar sounds should emanate from Ottawa.

Let not the silence from Ottawa match that from the IOC.

UN has no moral authority to judge

Morris Sosnovitch's letter to The CJN ("Criticism of ICJ Overstated," Aug. 5) reflects the dangerous cloak of legitimacy that the International Court of Justice opinion gives Israel's critics. Sosnovitch states that I, together with "other pro-Israel commentators," overstate the case by "labelling the court indifferent to Jewish lives." The ICJ's indifference is a product of its deafening silence on the issue of Palestinian terror and its inevitable effects on Israel's decision-making, and not of my or any other "pro-Israel commentary."

Sosnovitch suggests that Israel might have received a fair hearing had it recognized the ICJ's jurisdiction to render an advisory opinion. This suggestion ignores the advisory role of the ICJ and the evidentiary rules of the court. The advisory opinion was rendered in response to a question posed by the United Nations General Assembly. Israel was not a party to the case and did not bear the burden of proving why it has chosen to defend its citizens from murderous Palestinian terrorism.

As noted by Judge Thomas Buergenthal of the United States in his dissent, Israel's decision not to take part in the hearing may not have been wise, but the ICJ had a duty to gather and consider all of the relevant evidence, instead of drawing sweeping conclusions in a vacuum.

There is one point on which I agree with Sosnovitch: "Given the question posed to it by the United Nations General Assembly, the court could hardly have reached any other decision." The question Sosnovitch should be asking is why a General Assembly that counts dictators, thugs and monarchies among its members has the moral authority to question and judge Israel and its brave citizens. The answer is that it does not.

Values were indeed betrayed

Gil Troy's article,"Fence abstention betrays Canadian values" (CJN, Aug. 12), is right on target, and I believe we can do what he recommends while, at the same time, following the basic principles and advice of the "expensive pollsters." We can "talk Canadian" with a passionate voice. But we must speak out. Letters, faxes, e-mails and phone calls to our elected representatives have to politely, but forcefully, correct, or commend, where applicable, their actions.

Debating God's will

The information in Martin Lockshin's article regarding the debate in the Israeli Orthodox community on the disengagement issue is interesting and encouraging ("Jewish theology and the Gaza withdrawal," CJN, Aug. 12). It is, however, important to recognize that Orthodox Jewry is only one of many forums where such a debate is taking place. For the majority of Israelis, as well as the world at large, the issue is not between God and the people of Israel, but between Israel and the Palestinians.

The debate Lockshin applauds is still among people who believe that God's will should determine the fate of the settlements. Luckily, they have begun to question the main premise of this approach, namely that we can know what God's will is.

Scotch not newsworthy

I was disappointed with your article, "Single malts the toast of kiddush clubs" (Aug. 4). The article was not newsworthy and certainly not worthy of front-page coverage. Will The CJN continue with a series on the virtues of gambling and the best brands of cigars?

Photo ID?

The Saint John Jewish Historical Museum in Saint John, N.B., has been contacted by a gentleman living in Scotland who was looking for information about an apparently Jewish football team photo taken in a community called Perth. He believed the photo to have been taken in Canada. He thought it might be New Brunswick, where there is, indeed, a community of that name, but one that does not have a Jewish population. I am writing in the hope that someone among your readership might be able to identify the photo in some way. The team photo dates from around 1918 to 1920, based on the dates on the players' caps.

Please contact the Museum at 29 Wellington Row, Saint John, N.B., E2L 3H4, telephone 506-633-1833, fax 506-642-9926 or e-mail sjjhm@nbnet.nb.ca.

The terrorist hunter

Last year, a remarkable memoir, Terrorist Hunter: The Extraordinary Story of a Woman Who Went Undercover to Infiltrate the Radical Islamic Groups Operating in America, was published in the United States. The author was listed as "Anonymous," but was later revealed to be an Iraqi-born woman, Rita Katz.

The book tells the story of a Jewish woman who was born into an affluent Jewish family in Basra, Iraq. Her father had a successful business with strong ties to many of the Muslims governing the country.

During the Six Day War, the Iraqi government sent two army regiments to fight against Israel. Both were defeated in battle, and 10 Iraqi fighter planes were destroyed on their way to the front. For the Iraqi regime in Baghdad, this was considered a shameful disaster.

The Iraqi government sought a way to avenge this military defeat, and the author's family was the perfect scapegoat. Her father was arrested and accused of spying for Israel. A mock trial was held in Baghdad in 1969 without allowing him any defence. He was sentenced to death and hanged together with eight other Jewish men, who were also accused of spying for Israel. The remaining members of the family – the pregnant mother, two sons and the daughter – were held under partial home arrest, in isolated small rooms, guarded by the Iraqi police in Baghdad.

One Friday after evening prayer, the mother prepared coffee for the guards, as she did every day, but this time, the coffee was spiked with a large dose of valium. The family managed to escape into a waiting van while the guards slept. Then, with the help of Kurdish smugglers, the family succeeded in crossing the border into Iran and subsequently to Israel.

In Israel, after a year in an absorption centre during which she took lessons in fashion design, the author's mother opened an apparel shop in Tel Aviv and raised her four children, as a single parent. When the daughter was eight years old, she adopted the name Rita.

Rita ultimately studied at Tel Aviv University, where she met her future husband, Russian-born Leo Katz. A few years later, Rita and Leo Katz left Israel for the United States. Leo Katz found work in the engineering field and Rita was accepted at an institute that did research on the Middle East.

Rita's first duty was to translate into English articles that appeared in an Arabic newspaper in the United States and other parts of the world. While doing research on a Middle Eastern organization, she noticed that for Arab and Muslim groups, it was fairly easy to become designated as a charitable organization in the United States, and, at the same time, be exempted from paying taxes.

Dozens of these "charity organizations" were found in the United States collecting funds to help "the poor Palestinians refugees" or "to support the widows and their children, victims of the Israeli occupation."

In her memoir, Katz reveals that most of the funds raised were sent to terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

In trying to expose these groups, Katz used to dress in the abaia, the traditional Arab woman's clothes, covering her body and head, and attend Friday prayers at mosques or go to the annual meetings of these organizations, held in major American cities. Under the abaia, she hid a recorder that taped the speeches and sermons given by imams (Muslim clergymen) and other distinguished Arab guests. She was fully aware of the danger she could be in if she was caught.

In 1995, one visitor to the United States for a speaking engagement was Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri, at the time a representative of the Kuwaiti Red Crescent. Al-Zawahiri was Osama Bin Laden's chief deputy and personal doctor, and the ideological architect of Al Qaeda. He was sentenced to death in Egypt for his role in the Egyptian Islamic Jihad. However, while in the United States, he collected half a million dollars for a "charitable cause." He later used the money to bomb the Egyptian Embassy in Pakistan.

When the U.S.S.R. invaded Afghanistan in the late 1970s, Muslims and Arabs from all over the world joined the jihad against the Soviets. In 1979, Bin Laden, then just 22 years old, graduated with a degree in economics from the university in Jedda, Saudi Arabia. He and his nine brothers ran their father's business, which specialized in building tunnels. In the same year, Bin Laden joined the mujahedeen in Afganistan and used his experience to build bunkers in the mountains of Afghanistan.

In the beginning, Bin Laden had a small group of loyal men, called the followers of Al-Masada. They later became Al Qaeda.

Under its new name, Al Qaeda became a global organization, establishing cells in the United States, Spain, Germany, France, Saudia Arabia and Iraq. In the United States, it was involved in several terrorist attacks, including the 1990 murder of Rabbi Meir Kahane, leader of the far-right Kach party, and the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

The FBI mistakenly dismissed all these early terrorist attacks as isolated incidents. The FBI claimed there was no reason to worry about the Kahane murder by a fanatic Muslim who killed "one crazy Jew."

Katz and her organization repeatedly wrote letters to the FBI, the CIA, the U.S. Immigration Department and even the White House, attempting to convince them that there was a conspiracy by murderous terrorists involved in these operations. All their warnings were in vain, as the FBI left "a trail of criminal negligence all the way from the World Trade Center bombing in 1993 to the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001" Katz writes in Terrorist Hunter.

"There's fierce competition among the agencies. Instead of collaboration with the mutual aim of hunting down terrorists, some agencies are obsessed with prestige and credit. Who gets the gold star?"

Another terrorist group, Al-Muhajiroun, based in the United Kingdom, also had a branch in New York City. It held a rally in front of the United Nations building on April 28, 2001, just a few months before 9-11.

Kamran Bokhari, the head of Al-Muhajiroun in New York, said: "We are only a few here, but we have a billion Muslims behind the jihad. One day, we will liberate all Muslim lands. One day, you will see the flag of Islam over the White House!"

When the recording of this rally was submitted to U.S. government representatives, they said Bokhari's words were well within the reasonable limits of freedom of speech.

On Sept. 24, 2002, U.S. President George W. Bush announced his plan to go after groups who fund terrorists. Four days before Bush made his announcement, a government official had asked Rita Katz for information about at least 60 charitable organizations and businesses run by Arabs and Muslims in the United States. Bush's address included information from Katz's report, word for word.

To protect herself, Katz intended to publish Terrorist Hunter anonymously. But shortly before the book appeared in June 2003, she was interviewed, also anonymously, by 60 Minutes. Some of the organizations accused in her book sued her, claiming her information was incorrect, and her identity as the author was revealed just before the book was released. She has said in subsequent interviews that she stands by every word she wrote and continues to fight terrorism in her work.

Living far but keeping close

I flew home from Boston last Monday night. I had gone there on Sunday to babysit my grandchildren. They only needed me for seven hours. Everyone – except my daughter – told me I was crazy.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Even I knew that, rationally, the trip did not make any sense. Their regular babysitter was available. So why did I take up two precious days when I have so much work to do? Because I am committed to being an active part of my children's and grandchildren's lives.

I know there are many new ways of maintaining such a presence. We all use the phone, e-mail, instant messaging, computer or digital movies, etc. (Does anyone still write letters?) But nothing compares to a real hug. So, like many of my friends, I work at it. My parents and in-laws were not able to be here frequently, and we went to visit only once or twice. But that's not enough. I am driven by my own personal need to be with my grandchildren, not just their need to have me there. So I go frequently, even if it's only for 24 hours.

Waiting for the plane, I thought about my own compulsion to maintain a strong relationship with my descendants. And I contemplated the biblical models of extended family life. I am not promoting living with all of one's kin – an impossible and even unappetizing idea. But submerged in many of those stories is a lesson for us today.

I understand Ruth and Orpah refusing to leave Naomi; Abraham's difficulty in removing Hagar and Yishmael; Jacob's distraught reaction to his sons' departure; even Laban's tight control over his daughter's place of habitation. On the other hand, women often shifted locations from paternal to spousal, from mother to mother-in-law. I wonder at the difficulty and loneliness. Perhaps Rachel wanted her sister to live with her. Although there are many other issues in the above stories, they do affirm the intensity of the familial connection. Perhaps I'm being romantic, but I would dearly love to live within easy reach of my extended family.

With the High Holy Days fast approaching, we should examine our efforts at maintaining familial relations. With all of our modern complications, keeping close is a challenge. As the family expands, there are other families and work conditions to consider. So I cannot counteract my yearning with the placebo that we will all be together for the holidays. Those large get-togethers are great, and I derive great nachas from watching the multi-generational interactions. But they can't replace the consistency and security of a real and regular presence – not for me and not for them.

Stay close and work at it, for their sake and yours.

It's a beautiful world

There can be few more intense moments in our lives than when we hear the cry of a newborn. As grandparents to be, we spent an anxious night waiting for our first grandchild, and at about 6:30 a.m. on Sunday, Aug. 15, our 39th wedding anniversary, we heard that blessed sound.

A new neshamah has been added to the people of Israel.

That weekend was even more fraught with meaning, since it was also the anniversary of my father's passing. Remembering him as I wrote last month's column, I never thought the advent of his great-grandchild would begin on the day of his yahrzeit.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

When I was born, my father was told to go home and sleep. Husbands at that time had only two choices – pace the hospital floors or go home and wait. Now, they are active participants, and my son-in-law was amazing, doing everything but panting and pushing. We, the grandparents-to-be, were the ones pacing around a quiet hospital as the night wore on.

We had just arrived home after a havdalah ceremony on the occasion of a bat mitzvah when the phone rang. In a few minutes, we were at the hospital to begin our night of waiting. I thought of the blessing we give our daughters – "May God make you as Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah" – which alludes to the fruitfulness of a mother's womb. I prayed that my daughter would emulate their joys, and be spared their sorrows.

Our matriarchs suffered greatly to bring their children into the world. Their yearning for children consumed them. Our tradition assigned them the mission to bear the children who would create a people dedicated to the service of an invisible and demanding God, one who combined infinite mercy with awesome justice when needed.

They were to give birth to a nation that was expected to complete the creation, mending where it was torn by strife and healing where it was wounded by hatred and war. Fixing the world – that's a big challenge for anyone, least of all for a squirming infant and her exhausted parents.

Looking at the sunrise as we left the hospital, the world looked pretty good. Vancouver's blue sky was pink with dawn, the noisy streets of her Saturday night were clean and quiet on the Sunday morning. So many possibilities, I thought, for this luminous new life. As a Jewish woman, so many opportunities and blessings await her.

How much the world had changed in its offerings to this newest soul. My husband tells that, on the occasion of his brother's circumcision, their grandfather sighed, "Now the whole world is his enemy." For the immigrant generation, the birth of a child was wrapped in the shadows of the pogroms they had so recently fled and bound by the terror of the Holocaust that had not abated when their grandchildren began to be born.

Is the whole world the enemy of our children?

On that bright blue morning, I could not believe it.

In her short story The Tornado Watch Cookbook (in Shaking Eve's Tree, edited by Sharon Niederman), Carol K. Howell imagines a mother and daughter on the cusp of reconciliation as the daughter reveals her pregnancy. They struggle to speak to each other across gulfs only mothers and daughters can create. The daughter views her child with anxiety, the grandmother with longing. "What do YOU believe?" the daughter challenges her mother.

"To tell you the truth, I don't know what I really believe or what I partly believe or what I just want to believe," the mother responds. "It's tradition, it's how I remember, it's what connects me to the past. Jews don't think about heaven – we think about history. We just don't pop into a vacuum, you know."

No, Jews don't just pop into a vacuum. Our coming into the world, just like our leaving, is part of a tradition that continues to argue with itself even as it unfolds.

I don't believe the whole world is the enemy of this new life. Today, I believe Sheyna will be as beautiful as her name, and will find beauty in her world.

That's my blessing to her. May the world see her as beautiful, and may she add to the fine beauty and repair of that world in return.

Guest Voice

When it comes to politics in Israel, left and right rarely agree. But there is one issue that should unite all Israelis and their American supporters: the need to foster opportunity and equality for Israel's 1.2 million Arab citizens.

Ami Nahshon in Jerusalem

At a time when Israel faces profound challenges, some may question whether this issue belongs at the forefront of the nation's agenda. For a growing number of Israeli leaders on both sides of the political divide, however, Jewish-Arab coexistence and equality are beginning to get the attention they deserve. Improving living conditions in the Arab sector and reversing the growing alienation between Israel's Jewish and Arab citizens are necessary steps towards building a more stable society.

Although living standards for Arab Israelis have improved steadily over the past 15 years, disturbing socio-economic gaps still exist between the Jewish and Arab communities. By all measures, Arab Israelis lag far behind their Jewish peers. Infant mortality is twice as high for Arab citizens, while average wages are 40 per cent lower. In education, Arabs also fare poorly, with larger classes and fewer resources. Although Arabs comprise 18 per cent of the population, only five per cent of Israeli college graduates are Arab. The picture is equally grim in housing – since 1995, Israel's government has built nearly 340,000 public housing units for Jews and only 1,000 for Arabs.

Conditions like these, coupled with a string of broken promises from several governments, are fuelling alienation and anger within the Arab community. In October 2000, sparked by the resurgence of the Palestinian intifadah, violence between Israeli Arabs and the police erupted in the Galilee. Thirteen Israeli citizens – 12 Arabs and one Jew – died. The riots, along with the emergence of Islamic fundamentalism in Israel and the involvement of a small number of Arab Israelis in terrorist acts, have created a new level of fear and mistrust among Israeli Jews. On the other side, provocative public rhetoric and calls by some Jewish political figures for the transfer of Arab citizens from Israel have added to the tension.

Israelis and their American friends must tackle these issues head-on to halt the further fragmentation of Israeli society and build a culture of coexistence based on the values of mutual respect, equality and shared citizenship.

Education will play a major role in achieving these objectives. Israel's few experimental bilingual schools have been a success among students and parents.

Next January, a pilot project in Haifa will mandate the study of conversational Arabic and Arab culture in 25 per cent of the city's Jewish elementary schools. This program will give Jewish children a window into their neighbour's culture and send a much-needed signal of respect and inclusion to Arab Israelis.

Schools are only one institution that must undergo fundamental change. More than three years after the Galilee riots, relations between Arab Israelis and the police remain strained. Many Jewish police officers lack sufficient knowledge to effectively serve Arab or ethnically mixed communities.

To counter this, the Israel police and the Abraham Fund initiatives, with the support of the UJA-Federation of New York, have implemented a project to transform relations between Arab Israelis and the police. Through education and training, recruitment of Arab Israeli officers and volunteers, and improved communication, the project is raising awareness among police in the region and reducing the chance of violence.

Major institutional changes such as these must be accompanied by tangible government efforts to improve infrastructure, close spending gaps and expand opportunities for Arab Israelis in education and employment.

The goal of creating a more just and equitable society is a Jewish value that transcends traditional notions of left and right. That is why former president Yitzhak Navon and other leaders from all of Israel's major political parties are advocating for change. They recognize that social security is as important as physical security, and that Israel's future will rest in part on a more complete integration of the Arab minority into the economic, social and cultural mainstream of Israeli life.

Ami Nahshon is the president and CEO of the Abraham Fund Initiatives, a New York- and Jerusalem-based not-for-profit organization dedicated to advancing coexistence and equality among Israel's Jewish and Arab citizens.

The Kirshner File

PA torn by chaos as Arafat reigns supreme

Ten years ago last month, Yasser Arafat, the perennial symbol of the Palestinian national movement, returned triumphantly from exile in Tunisia. Crossing the Rafah border point into the teeming Gaza Strip, Arafat was the man of the hour as his convoy of vehicles was hailed by tens of thousands of applauding, cheering and whistling Palestinian well-wishers lined up along the route from Egypt.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Thanks to the Oslo accords, signed a year earlier by Israeli and Palestinian negotiators after almost a year of intense secret talks sanctioned by Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's prime minister, Arafat and his colleagues emerged from banishment in Tunis, and were poised to assume control of the newly formed Palestinian Authority, based in Gaza.

In accordance with the provisions of the Oslo agreement, Israel had pulled out of much of Gaza, leaving an archipelago of existing Jewish settlements for itself and the balance – designated as the Palestinian autonomous areas – to Arafat, the head of the PLO. For the first time in 26 years, since his flight from the West Bank in the wake of the Six Day War, Arafat set foot on Palestinian soil.

For Israelis who supported the Oslo process, which was supposed to have ended Israel's historic conflict with the Palestinians, Arafat's return ushered in a new era of fruitful coexistence. To many Arabs in Gaza and the West Bank, the formation of the PA was the harbinger of Palestinian statehood and, with it, the promise of prosperity and stability.

A decade on, the respective dreams of Israelis and Palestinians have crumbled into dust. Hopes have turned into fears and sober assessments have supplanted dewy-eyed illusions as mutual trust has been swept away in a bitter tide of mutual recrimination.

The turning point, of course, was the second Palestinian uprising, which erupted toward the close of September 2000 after Ariel Sharon, then leader of the Likud party, visited the disputed Temple Mount in the company of hundreds of police.

The rest, as they say, is history.

Pent-up tensions flared as Palestinian demonstrations broke out. Shots were fired and people were killed. Oslo was gutted and the prospects for peace quickly faded as terrorism took hold.

But the intifadah, with its fearful loss of lives, has not been the only sour note to mar developments since 1994.

Much to their disillusionment, the Palestinians of Gaza and the West Bank have learned that the PA has not lived up to their expectations.

The PA, in terms of providing effective and corruption-free governance, generating economic opportunities and producing security, has been an abysmal failure. In light of these facts, the Palestinian leadership is largely to blame for its internal problems. But Israel is hardly blameless. Its continuing closures and raids to flush out terrorists have had a profound and devastating impact on the PA's infrastructure, viability and ability to govern.

Several months ago, prior to the recent crisis that sparked the temporary resignation of PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia, his chief of staff, Hassan Abu Libdeh, observed darkly that the collapse of the PA was " a real possibility." In sombre tones, Libdeh warned that its dissolution could lead to "a lawless situation" that might well strengthen radical groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

More recently, the United Nations' top envoy to the Middle East, Terje Roed Larsen, declared that the PA was gripped by "paralysis" and " deep distress" and was heading toward collapse, and that Arafat lacked the political will to follow up on promised reforms and to stem anarchy. (Larsen, a key figure in the Oslo process, rapped Israel on the knuckles, too, criticizing it for overly aggressive military tactics and the expansion of settlements in the territories).

Larsen's cri de coeur was, to say the least, prescient. Within days of his statement, which earned him Arafat's enmity, the PA was torn by some of the worst chaos since its inception a decade ago.

The crisis, which in part was a power struggle among competing Fatah factions nominally loyal to Arafat and in part a reaction to Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza, broke out in mid-July with the kidnapping of Ghazi Jabali, the commander of the PA police force in Gaza and a man often accused of corruption. It escalated when his aide, Khaled Abu Ula, and four French aid workers in Khan Younis, were abducted by masked gunmen.

The uncertainty deepened when Arafat, confined by Israel to his compound in Ramallah for the past two years, appointed his nephew, Musa Arafat, to command one of the PA's main security bodies. The appointment enraged Palestinian reformers – who view Musa Arafat as hopelessly corrupt and venal – and touched off a firefight in Rafah that wounded 18 Palestinians.

From his office in Ramallah, Arafat declared a state of emergency. Not having been consulted, Qureia resigned. He was the second PA prime minister since Mahmoud Abbas – who lasted 130 days – to step down before his term of office had ended.

The cause of both resignations was identical: Arafat's obsessive concentration of power in his own hands and his stubborn refusal to consolidate the PA's dozen or so security forces into three distinct forces and transfer their authority to an empowered prime minister.

Israel and the United States, which severed ties with Arafat in 2001 and 2002 respectively, have called for consolidation. Their overriding objectives are twofold: to centralize the PA's security agencies under the auspices of a prime minister not beholden to Arafat, and to marginalize Arafat himself.

Ultimately, Arafat ceded control over some of the security agencies to Qureia, who thereupon retracted his resignation. Arafat simply could not resist the mounting pressure exerted on him by Palestinian reformers such as Mohammed Dahlan, the former director of PA security forces in Gaza, as well as Egypt, which is working with Israel to implement Prime Minister Arie Sharon's disengagement plan in Gaza, and the European Union, which has propped up the PA with generous donations.

Yasser Arafat

Yet Arafat – the ultimate survivor who lived through an airplane crash in the Libyan desert in the early 1990s and who has weathered a succession of crises since his takeover of the PLO in the late 1960s – essentially remains in charge of the PA. He controls the most important security forces and exercises veto power over security and political issues.

Basically, Palestinian reformers are pushing to entrench fundamental precepts taken for granted in Canada – the rule of law and an independent and honest judiciary. As well, they want to elect a new legislative council that truly reflects the pluralism of Palestinian society.

Dahlan, one of the most vocal reformers and Israel's putative candidate to rule Gaza after an Israeli withdrawal, has said that untold millions of dollars in foreign assistance have disappeared into black holes. (Dahlan's rivals dismiss him as a corrupt "foreign agent.") The mismanagement of funds has been a source of discontent for years. An internal 1997 PA report spoke of dishonest and inept administrative and financial practices and estimated that $326 million (US) in public funds were stolen or misused in 1996 alone.

The story, though given prominent play abroad, was ignored by the PA-controlled media, and an independent TV station that investigated the matter was summarily closed. Arafat has little patience for western concepts pertaining to the media. Soon after he returned to Gaza from Tunis, he shut down the cantankerous newspaper al-Nahar. A year later, he ordered the arrest of Mahir al-Alami, the editor of Al Quds, because he ran a piece about Arafat on page 8 rather than on page one. Since then, there have been a series of disquieting incidents in which the press has been muzzled.

Arafat also keeps the courts on a short leash. When he or his associates dislike a judicial decision, they ignore it.

And his stewardship of the economy has been shaky. Unemployment runs high and the gross national product is in free fall. Due to the persistence of terrorism, only a small percentage of Palestinian workers are allowed into Israel. As a result, living conditions in the PA have worsened considerably.

Although Arafat runs the PA like a "one-man show," to quote Palestinian legislator and human rights activist Hanan Ashrawi, the masses adore him. Even his Palestinian enemies rarely attack him directly, fearing that his demise would create a dangerous vacuum advantageous to Israel and, possibly, spark a ruinous civil war.

At 75, Arafat is the living, breathing face of Palestinian nationalism. And though he tolerates corruption and has been personally linked to it, he is widely regarded as an ascetic and untouchable leader with clean hands.

Still, the government he administers, the PA, is hardly a model of transparency or democracy.

Ve'ahavta offers food and fun for the homeless

By CARA EDELL and JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Interns

It may have been raining, but the second annual Great Escape Island Adventure was definitely not a washout.

Hosted by Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, the Aug. 13 event at Centre Island was a day of refuge, food and fun for Toronto's homeless.

Robyn Tousson, one of the event's organizers and manager of Ve'ahavta's volunteer programs, said although a rain date was set, she did not want to change the original plans.

"I was disappointed with the weather. But one of the clients came up and thanked me, saying 'I'm happy it's on a rainy day because those are the hardest days for me. This is the best day I've had in so long.' That was a really cool moment," Tousson said.

About 80 homeless people, mostly teenagers, and more than 20 volunteers gathered under a pavilion for hours of leisure activities during the substance-free day.

With activities ranging from arts and crafts to a spa station and a reading corner, participants were "reminded of how wonderful and joyous life can be," said Darryl Borden, Ve'ahavta's director of homeless initiatives.

The activities, planned by volunteers Danielle Kuczynski and Elias Parker, also included a watermelon eating contest, a juggling workshop, massages, henna tattoos and sports.

A talent show featuring singing, dancing, stand-up comedy and balloon twisting allowed participants to showcase their abilities.

"It broke the ice and created a comfort level," said Tousson. She said one of the guests gave a speech about how the organization has inspired him to return to school.

The show's 10 participants, as well as the spectators, received prizes during the afternoon. The biggest giveaway was a new bicycle donated by a Toronto family. Other freebies included CDs from HMV and Penguin Music; Cineplex Odeon movie gift certificates; instant cameras from Kyoto Photo; 64 comic books from Third Quadrant; a knapsack, t-shirts and hats from a sporting-goods store; and a $25 gift certificate from Pages bookstore.

For food, What-A-Bagel donated 19 dozen bagels, six rye breads and a few hundred danishes, which were set up on picnic tables in a buffet. Drinks, chips, chocolate bars, candy, fruit, pasta salads, condiments and deli meats added to the lunch selection.

"People were so so generous," said Danila Bloomberg, a Ve'ahavta volunteer who has been helping the organization for a few months. "I live downtown, so [the homeless] are part of my community. If we try to integrate them as much as possible, hopefully they'll see what they're missing and will be motivated to come off the streets."

All of the guests were given free cotton candy and tickets for the midway. They spent the rest of the day on the rides and left with goodie bags and books.

"They live outside society and, as we can see, they are desperate to come back in," said Borden. "They're waiting on the side of the road for Ve'ahavta or any loving kind individual to reach out and say, 'Come and join us.' And they came and joined us."

One of the participants, who didn't want to be named, has been living on the streets for eight months. He said he was recently offered a job by Toronto Hydro and is saving money to rent an apartment. After being handed a flyer about the event, he decided to bring some of his friends to the island.

"I think [Ve'ahavta] is great. It's good to get out of the city," he said. "I'm excited and happy to be here and I would come out again."

Another participant, a teenage girl, said she heard about the event through her shelter. She signed up to sing Usher's Caught Up in the talent show and said she knew most of the people in attendance.

Participants took part in a range of activities ranging from arts and crafts to a spa station and a reading corner.

Borden said two of last year's homeless participants came off the streets after experiencing the carefree day of laughter and entertainment. He credited this year's group for taking the initiative to join the "adventure."

"Eighty per cent of the people here are living out of society," he said. "You can imagine how difficult it was for them to come here today – to keep to the schedule, meet us at the docks and take the ferry. It should be something recognized as an incredible accomplishment.

"We recognize that the real results of [the great escape] will come days, weeks, months from now. We planted the seeds of life. We'll see how they grow.

"I'm getting a lot of nachas, a lot of good feelings. Even on a rainy day like this, it's beautiful."

Bezmozgis is one to watch

Books
Bernard Baskin

Natasha and Other Stories by David Bezmozgis, HarperFlamingo-Canada, $24.95.

It took me about four hours to read the seven linked short stories that comprise this debut collection by a 31-year-old Torontonian. The following afternoon I read several of them again to recapture something of their spare beauty and emotional power.

These partially autobiographical stories have been widely praised and published in such career-making magazines as The New Yorker and Harper's. They concern Roman Berman, his wife and his son who emigrated from Latvia to Canada in 1980 with no connections or linguistic facility.

The father is a former Soviet athletic trainer who aspires to be a massage therapist. His son Mark, a first-grader, grows up over the next two decades that the stories span and serves as narrator of his Jewish family, painfully trying to assimilate into an unfamiliar but exciting environment.

In the story Tapka, six-year-old Mark and a cousin are put in charge of dog-sitting a Russian neighbour's much-loved Lhasa apso. The carefree children give the dog freedom from its leash, and it dashes into busy traffic and suffers a near-fatal injury. Mark appeals to the owners who are swaying in their grief. "I love Tapka. I meant her no harm. I want to be forgiven."

"The swaying replied: There is reality and then there is truth. The reality is that Tapka will live. But let's be honest, the truth is you killed Tapka. Look at Rita; look at Misha. You see, who are you kidding? You killed Tapka and you will never be forgiven."

In the story Roman Berman, Massage Therapist, the family, eager for help, is invited to dinner at the home of wealthy Dr. Kornblum, who has shown concern and sympathy for Russian immigrants. It turns out that what most interests him is how Jews suffered in Russia. He wallows in horror stories. He solicits tear-jerking testimony.

When he asks the Bermans if they had been refuseniks, Mark relates, "My mother hesitated a moment and then admitted that we had not been refuseniks. She knew some refuseniks, and we were almost refuseniks, but we were not refuseniks."

Baffled and humiliated, pawns in a callous game of faux superiority, the family makes its way home, disposing of the gift they had brought, a cake the Kornblums had rejected. Although the Kornblums "sometimes took their kids to McDonald's, they kept kosher at home. So although it smelled wonderful, unfortunately they couldn't keep it."

In An Animal to the Memory, 15-year-old Mark is a reluctant and truculent student at Hebrew school. "I kept to myself, glowered in the hallways, and, with the right kind of provocation, punched people in the face." Some of his friends congratulate him, saying, "You're the toughest kid in Hebrew school."

When the school observes Holocaust Remembrance Day, Mark attacks a taunting fellow student. Rabbi Gurvich is outraged. "How is it that all of this doesn't mean anything to you, Berman? Can you tell me?"

The rabbi forces the sullen boy to proclaim that he is a Jew. "He tightened his grip on my shoulder until he saw it hurt. I was convinced he was gong to hit me. The last thing I wanted to do was start crying, so I started crying.

"I'm a Jew! I shouted into his face.

"My voice rang off the walls, and off the sculptures and the pictures and the candles. I had screamed it in his face wishing to kill him, but he only nodded his head. He kept his hand on my shoulder and waited until I really started to sob… I wanted to sit down on the floor, or lean against a wall, something. Anything but stand in the middle of the hallway… Halfway out, before closing the doors, Gurvich looked back to where I hadn't moved.

"Now, Berman, he said, now maybe you understand what it is to be a Jew."

Bezmozgis, somewhat extravagantly, has been compared to a number of classic short-story writers. This kind of hype is unwarranted; after all, his entire oeuvre consists of just this one thin volume. But his talent is unquestionable and his future seems bright.

The civilizing effect of the Jews

Guest Voice

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

Hershel Shanks, editor emeritus of Moment magazine, recently raised the tantalizing possibility that the Iraqi city of Fallujah may be identical to the Babylonian Talmudic centre known as Pumbedita.

Citing a 19th-century scholar, Jacob Obermeyer, he suggests that the two names (by way of the Syriac rendering, Pallughtha) are linguistic equivalents. Babylonia, of course, overlaps largely with contemporary Iraq, and Pumbedita, in fact, lay on the banks of the Euphrates River, as does Fallujah.

Pumbedita was for centuries a centre of Jewish religious and intellectual activity. It hosted one of the major academies when the Babylonian Talmud was completed at the beginning of the sixth century CE and continued to be a centre of Jewish study throughout most of what is known as the Gaonic period.

Today, Fallujah is widely considered one of the most violence-prone areas in Iraq. A hotbed of Wahabi tribal emotions, it has a long history of bloodshed, and it was there that four American contractors were brutally murdered earlier this year. Not a pretty or peaceful place. Even its Syriac name, Pallughtha, implies strife. While some see the word referring to a "split" there in the river's flow in ancient times, it can just as easily be translated as "dispute."

Yet, if Fallujah is indeed Pumbedita, it certainly seems to have been quite hospitable to Jews – as was Babylonia in general – 1,500 years ago. It was there, and in other Babylonian cities such as Sura and Neherda'ah, that Jewish scholars recorded much of the Oral Law that Jews had studied and transmitted from generation to generation since biblical times; and it was where subtle points of the Torah's law were studied and taught, examined, contemplated and debated.

The famed psychiatrist Carl Jung put forth the intriguing idea that places have power, that lands have effects on their inhabitants. "The soil of every country," he wrote in Civilization in Transition (1918), "holds some such mystery… just as there is a relationship between mind to body, so there is a relationship of body to earth."

Whatever the merit of Jung's notion, Babylonia's conflict-ridden roots do in fact run deep. One of the Torah's first narratives is about the Tower of Bavel, identified with the capital of what would become Babylonia. When, in early human history, the populace there joined to build a structure whose top would "reach to the heavens" in order to "make for ourselves a name" – to in some way challenge the Creator, as the rabbinic commentaries explain – seeds of discord were divinely sown among them, in the form of different languages, and the diverse perceptions of things they reflect. The people, until then unified in their undertaking, came to disagree, to argue, to fight, and eventually to disperse to lands far and wide.

Could Jung have been right? Might Babylonia, so deeply unsettled a place to this day, have some power to evoke fractiousness?

If so, it is interesting that when Jews made Babylonia their home, they too engaged in disputes – holy, sublime ones, over the fine points of Jewish religious law. Such discussion is even referred to in rabbinic literature as "milchamta shel Torah" – "the war of Torah."

In fact, that is precisely what goes on in every contemporary yeshiva beit midrash, or study hall. The din in such places can be overwhelming, as students lock mental horns, fighting to the finish with their minds. When it is time for lunch, though, the battle ceases, and the disputants resemble the amiable partners they were all along. Their "fighting" was never personal, but rather a joint venture in the cause of a higher truth. As the Talmud puts it: "[Torah scholars] become like enemies to one another [when they engage in dialectic] but then become beloved friends" (Kiddushin, 30b).

It has been suggested that the effect of the Jewish people on history has been to tame the barbarism that is part of the human condition, that Judaism has helped to civilize the world. No less a thinker about Jews, and barbarian, than Hitler captured it well when he expressed contempt for what he characterized as the "effeminate ethics" of the Jew.

Perhaps the ancient Jewish academies in Babylonia were a reflection of that very civilizing effect, of how true holiness can mediate, even sublimate, strife.

Jewish software for your Palm Pilot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You CAN take it with you.

That is, if the "it" refers to a Jewish calendar, news about Israel, commentary about this week's Torah or a game or two to teach Hebrew basics. Since I first wrote about Jewish and Hebrew software for the Palm Pilot a few years ago, hand-held devices have evolved from being toys for geeks to ubiquitous productivity tools for businesspeople, students – and geeks, too. And along the way, programs and content designed for Jewish consumers have mushroomed. Today, I'll tell you where to look if you want to load up your Jewish Palm.

But first a couple of notes. Most of the sites mentioned today refer to the Palm, but you should also be able to find Jewish software for other handhelds, such as Windows Pocket PCs. While some of the software mentioned today is free for downloading, other programs are commercial or shareware, both of which you are allowed to try before you buy. If you continue to use shareware, you are expected to do the right thing and pay for it.

Rather than point you in the direction of several sites that offer Jewish software for your Palm, just visit PilotYid. [www.pilotyid.com/] Ari Engel has done a masterful job in scouring the web for programs that you can download onto your Palm. Here are just a few of the programs he links to. You can:

- find kosher restaurants around the world;
- convert dates between Jewish and secular calendars;
- read Flavius Josephus' The Wars of the Jews;
- learn a new Hebrew word every day;
- keep track of how long you are fleishig and when you are permitted to eat dairy again.

And for links to downloads for your Pocket PC, check out Ulrich Greve's website. [www. tichnut. de/jewish/windowsce. htm]

One of the most useful features for your handheld is AvantGo. [http:// avantgo.com/] After you download this free program, you can subscribe to hundreds of "channels" (usually free), such as the New York Times, the CBC or the BBC. Each time you HotSync your Palm, the latest news stories are automatically downloaded.

As for Jewish and Israeli content for AvantGo, Aish HaTorah offers a weekly selection of provocative and thought-provoking articles. This week on my Palm, there are articles about pulling the plug on TV, one woman's obsession with the mikvah and some dating advice. [www.aish.com/Avantgo/get_aish. com_on_handheld.asp] Ohr Somayach offers a similar service with its "Ask the Rabbi" feature and a look at this week's parshah. [http://ohr.edu/yhiy.php/ ohr_somayach/ohr_on_your_pda/]

Other AvantGo channels include Fact sOfIsrael.com [http://tinyurl.com/3u5 f3]. For more Jewish AvantGo channels, check out this page. [www.pilotyid. com/collection.php?cat=17]

Those are some of the basics. If you want to learn how to read Hebrew on your Palm, visit the Moadon at Penticon Technologies. [www.penticon.com/moa don.html] And if you want to join the Israeli community of hand-held software aficionados, take a look at the Hebrew-language Palmi site. [www.palmi.co.il/]

Now that you have loaded all that Jewish software onto your Palm, treat your high-tech gadget with the new respect it deserves. Rabbi Ephraim Zalmanovitz, spiritual leader of Israel's Mazkeret Batia community, studied the Palm Pilot and has issued a high-tech halachic ruling. According to the rabbi, someone who has "holy" software installed on a Palm, and drops it, must kiss it as one does a holy book, such as a siddur or other sacred book. [www.geocities.com/mayefeld/ press.html] On the other hand, the rabbi at Ohr Somayach says that you can take a Palm with Jewish material stored in it into the bathroom. Just don't display the text on the screen at the time.

Olympic addendum: Corina Eberle wrote to me after my article about Jewish Olympians to remind me about the incredible achievements of Bobbie Rosenfeld. As part of the Canadian track team, Rosenfeld picked up a gold and a silver medal at the 1928 Amsterdam Olympics. Rosenfeld also excelled in basketball, softball and hockey. Read more about the athlete on the web at the Jewish Women's Archive [www.jwa.org/ exhibits/wov/rosenfeld/] or in Anne Dublin's book Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything. [http://tinyurl.com/555zn]

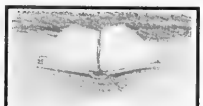
Rashi says: Crime doesn't pay

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The Torah requires us to be honest in the use of weights and measures. (Deuteronomy 25:14). You cannot have a pound weight in your pocket that is 17 ounces and one that is 15 ounces, so that when you want to buy a pound of flour you pull out the 17-ounce one and when you want to sell a pound of flour you pull out the 15-ounce one. You can't cheat someone else in weight or volume measurements.



In fact, the Torah says you can't even possess the inaccurate measures – you can't have them in your pocket or in your home. Having them around becomes too tempting – you will want to pull out the inaccurate measures, or may even do so accidentally. So just to be safe, don't keep them around.

Now, to be fair, this mitzvah does not assume we are all crooks. In the normal wear and tear of life, it is possible that my weights have become worn down or my measurements have become chipped or altered. (I am just trying to give people the benefit of the doubt, despite the Torah's rather obvious condemnation of what seems like outright theft).

But Rashi is bothered by a couple of extra words in the way the Torah presents this fairly simple and straightforward mitzvah, and he mines these words for a beautiful lesson.

The Torah actually says (Deuteronomy 25:13), "There will not be to you in your pocket stones and stones, big and small."

Rashi comments: "If you do this, you will have nothing."

Now, Rashi speaks in a kind of code, but what he means is quite beautiful. Crime doesn't pay. If you think that you will gain by cheating people with inaccurate measurements – a small pound, a heavy thumb on the scale, or any other kind of deception – well, you won't.

If you put the comma in the right spot in the verse, that's what it says: There will not be to you in your pocket, (those of you who have) stones and stones, big and small.

Rashi's comment is a principle of faith that we all have. When we are honest in business, when we pay our taxes, when we pay an honest full price for what we are purchasing, we don't think we are losing out, we think we are gaining.

Now, it could be that at this moment I have a few less shekels in my pocket because I paid my taxes honestly. But honesty brings blessings in other areas. The Master of All will give me a few more miles on the car before it breaks down. Or He will prevent a pipe from bursting in my house. We will never really know what bad things have been prevented from happening to us, so we will never know what expenses we were saved by virtue of those honest weights and measures. Who knows how many things almost happened to us, or were about to happen to us, or things that we barely avoided. We are oblivious to these "almosts" because we never know that they nearly happened.

Rashi mines a beautiful lesson from a grammatical twist in the verse – that crime doesn't pay. Using uneven weights and measures or taking advantage in business won't leave you with more in your pocket. Rather, honesty will certainly bring with it greater Divine blessings – whether we see it or not.

Board of Jewish Education reviews school compliance

Committee plans ongoing reviews

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is ensuring that its day schools are adhering to requirements established by UJA Federation for status as funded schools.

The BJE struck a committee in the fall of 2003 in order to review compliance in all 13 affiliated day schools over the past school year.

Members of the Affiliation and Compliance Committee were also charged with the responsibility of approving affiliation and funding for new applying schools.

Five of the schools assessed were found to be in complete compliance with funding requirements, there were financial concerns at three of them, and the other five did not satisfy the compliance requirements.

"UJA's Board of Jewish Education, in this instance, is representing the very best values of both the affiliated schools and the organized Jewish community," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President for Jewish Education and Identity. "The schools in full compliance can assure their parents that they are meeting the standards in all four areas that the community sees as required for the viability of a school. From the perspective of the Federation, this is an exercise in accountability for institutions receiving community funds."

The day schools were reviewed on four areas of compliance. They are:

- Governance: Qualifying schools are required to have a democratic board, which operates as a governing body.
- Educational Programs: The schools must adhere to high educational standards with regular monitoring, and they must make available to parents, their curricula and their teaching philosophy.
- Financial Viability and Accountability: BJE affiliated schools must ensure that they are operated in a fiscally prudent and responsible manner.
- Community Identification: They must identify with the mission of UJA Federation in terms of community participation and identification with Israel.

Through its Affiliation and Compliance Committee, the BJE is about to apply the same process for its supplementary schools during the upcoming school year.

BJE affiliated day schools were recently assessed for compliance.

A taste of Israel in the heart of Toronto

On Sunday, August 29th more than 5000 people are expected to converge on Suydam Park, deep in Toronto's Spadina Village, for the third annual Shuk in the Park.

Co-sponsored by UJA Federation, the event – created to celebrate the spirit of Israel right here in Toronto - is a free outdoor festival featuring a marketplace brimming with Israeli wares, live music, and kosher food. The festival runs, rain, or shine from noon until 6:00 PM. Net proceeds from the event will go to Orr Shalom, an Israeli non-profit organization that provides residential and therapeutic services for more than 350 at-risk children, aged 5-18, who have been removed from their homes due to severe abuse and neglect.

"Shuk in the Park is a great way to spend a summer afternoon while celebrating Israel," says Vivian Ringwald who came up with the idea. "With over 40 vendors and community booths retailing everything from body art to burgers, there is something for everyone and for all ages. By bringing Israeli culture to Toronto we help strengthen the community and raise some money for Orr Shalom Children's Homes."

An event for the whole family, participants can stroll the marketplace for authentic Israeli goods, enjoy falafel while playing shesh besh (backgammon), jam in the drumming circle with Living Rhythm, practice belly dancing, and experience Middle Eastern culture. Shuk in the Park will feature live music from Bais Groove, The Russell Leon Band, and Touch of Klez.

Ephraim Shoham, Israel's Trade Commissioner to Canada will also be on hand to bring greetings and congratulations.

"Torontonians have a wonderful opportunity to show their support for Israel's economy by attending the Shuk in the Park," says Shoham. "People will see that Israel offers a large variety of quality products, and to further strengthen Israel's economy, we encourage everyone to choose products made in Israel."

Shuk in the Park is co-produced with Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and Olive Branch for Israel, a group of young women who were inspired to promote awareness of Israeli products being boycotted in Europe.

Other sponsors include Creed Solutions, MBE, Magen Boys, Canadian Jewish News, Flight Centre, and Alexandroff Real Estate Limited.

More than 40 vendors will be selling Israeli goods at Sunday's Shuk in the Park.

Holocaust Centre partners in annual summer institute

In the wake of several antisemitic incidents in the Greater Toronto Area, UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto has teamed up with the Association for the Elimination of Hate for an annual summer institute to educate teachers about the dangers of intolerance.

More than 50 London teachers, together with members of the public, recently took part in the inaugural General Romeo Dallaire Summer Institute on Teaching the Holocaust and Genocide, at London's University of Western Ontario.

The Association for the Elimination of Hate (AEH) - which contacted Professor Adam Fuerstenberg, the director of the Holocaust Centre with the idea - is a London, Ontario-based, non-profit organization dedicated to eradicating hate-motivated violence and discriminatory practices. The AEH provides support, information and referrals to victims of hate-motivated crimes, as well as public education.

"I knew that the Holocaust Centre of Toronto is the premiere institute on the Holocaust in this part of the world, rich with experience and expertise, which is invaluable to organizations like us, which are trying to launch new initiatives," says Rich Hitchens, programming coordinator and public educator with AEH. "We were fortunate enough that the Centre extended its hand to us across the 401."

General Dallaire, the man for whom this important event was named – and the keynote speaker at the Institute - was the commander of the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Rwanda preceding and during the genocide that took place there. Not only did the United Nations ignore warnings from General Dallaire about the impending genocide, it prohibited him from-intervening to help prevent it.

Dallaire feels that there is a strong need to educate our teachers – and by extension, our students – about the importance of tolerance and acceptance.

"Where exactly are we (Canada) going to be in regard to the changing nature of our society," asks Dallaire. "And what are the elements that we need to work on to prepare for the significant influx, over the next decade or so, of non-white non Judeo-Christian immigrants who are going to be the core of our future?"

"It was a privilege to be able to participate in this very important educational initiative," says Fuerstenberg. "Education is at the forefront of battling antisemitism and racism. The opportunity to reach out to 50 teachers in the London area was a wonderful chance to extend the educational reach of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto. We look forward to becoming a full annual partner of the summer institute with the Association for the Elimination of Hate."

Gillerman senses change in UN attitude towards Israel

Israel's ambassador to UN keynote speaker at UJA Campaign Launch 2005

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Two important developments - Israel's construction of its security fence and the disengagement from Gaza - are positively influencing the public's perception of Israel and its role in the Middle East, according to Dan Gillerman, Israel's Ambassador to the United Nations.

Israel's Ambassador to the UN Dan Gillerman

In a recent telephone interview, Gillerman, keynote speaker at UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign 2005 launch this Monday, praised Israel's "courageous" and strategic maneuvers. "The disengagement from Gaza was very brave of Sharon. Israel is not just reacting or rebutting but taking initiative politically, creating more stability and bringing down terror substantially," said Gillerman.

The other key move by Israel, and one surrounded by much debate, according to Gillerman, is the security fence. "It has become a very heated issue but it must be understood how effective it is," he said. "Since its construction began, suicide bombings and terror attacks have been reduced by 95 percent; these are dramatic figures."

Gillerman, who has served as Israel's UN ambassador for the past 2 years, has endured what he describes as a roller coaster of emotions.

He enjoyed a sense of tremendous accomplishment when UN Secretary General Kofi Annan made a commitment to fight anti-semitism following the Berlin Conference.

"This was a very important event because of the reaction from the United Nations," said Gillerman. "They called a meeting because the conference was held. This indicated a very positive step in light of the UN's traditional attitude toward Israel and related issues."

Gillerman also praised the US for defending Israel. "The US position is starting to gain wider acceptance. Many see the UN abusing its time and resources and we detect a readiness of European countries to be more accepting at the upcoming General Assembly." For one thing, Gillerman expects less anti-Israel resolutions.

Conversely, Gillerman found reaction to the International Court decision in the Hague, against the security fence, to be worse than expected. "The European Union and the other countries had originally asked for an advisory opinion of the court but eventually accepted the ruling." In general, he says, the European Union has displayed much bias but Gillerman is optimistic that the attitude can change. "I have met with the European Union ambassador and with this dialogue we are bound to bridge the differing attitudes."

As for Canada's "dubious" positioning at the UN when it comes to Israel, Gillerman was very quick to praise Canada's ambassador Allan Rock as one of the most eloquent and impressive. "I believe he is personally a friend of Israel. Even with Canada's many abstentions, I appreciate that it is not the same as voting against us. I also appreciate what the Canadian Jewish community is doing to properly inform its different levels of government and am hopeful that we will soon see a true friend in Canada."

The UJA Federation Campaign Launch at which Gillerman will be speaking takes place Monday, August 30 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel. Tickets are available by calling 416-631-5700 or visiting www.jewishtoronto.com

Toronto donation spurs on other communities

UJA Federation campaign funds recently purchased a fire engine for the Eilat Fire Brigade. Before the arrival of this crucial vehicle, capable of reaching high-rise buildings, Eilat firefighters were forced to rely on a truck from Be'ersheva, more than 200 kilometres away. Now firefighters will be able to handle incidents at Eilat's largest hotels and tallest structures. Since the donation by the Toronto community, other communities across North America have stepped up to the plate and another five fire engines have already been donated.

GA mission a chance to promote Toronto for 2005

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

At least 200 members of Toronto's Jewish community are expected to attend the General Assembly (GA) of United Jewish Communities in Cleveland on November 14, and their presence there will be twofold.

Besides taking part in the world's largest assembly of Jewish leaders including Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the Torontonians will be in Cleveland to promote Toronto, which will be hosting the 2005 GA.

By taking part in the upcoming UJA Federation mission to Cleveland, participants will become Toronto's personal ambassadors.

Representatives from Tourism Toronto will also be in Cleveland to promote the city.

"Since Toronto will be hosting the GA in 2005, we are planning a major presence in Cleveland to highlight our city as a world-class destination and our Jewish community as a North American leader," says Marilyn Maierovitz, Toronto GA coordinator.

Plans are well underway for Toronto's GA, chaired by Peter Ekstein and Debbie Kimel, which will be held in November 2005. Both Ekstein and Kimel will be aboard the mission to Cleveland.

"This mission will be a wonderful opportunity for Torontonians to play a major role in the success of the 2005 GA in their own city," says Ekstein who is looking forward to making the trip to Cleveland. "This is a chance to really promote our city and our own incredible Jewish community – a community that really is one of the strongest and most committed in the world. This is an opportunity not to be missed."

"It's so important now, as we see signs of a rise in antisemitism around the world and in our own city, that we – as Jews – come together, showing strength and solidarity, and make our presence known in Cleveland," says Kimel. "Toronto Jewry has such a great reputation around the world, let's show that spirit this November in Cleveland."

Ashkenaz Festival celebrates our Yiddish heritage

BY CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture, running Aug. 31 to Sept. 6 at Harbourfront Centre, gets people to focus on the importance of maintaining our Yiddish culture, says the festival's artistic director.

"We still have not realized the wealth of our history in terms of Yiddish heritage. This is the week to do that," says Mitch Smolkin.

The festival, this year themed "Migration," has run every two years since 1995. It features international artists from around the world including Yossi Vassa from Ethiopia, Les Yeux Noirs from France, South America's Klezmer en Buenos Aires and Ot Azoj from Holland.

Highlights of the week include an all-star Yiddish concert at Beth Sholom Synagogue; a klezmer concert for children; dance, fiddle and papercutting workshops; a Yiddish humour brunch with Avrom Lichtenboym; and performances by such groups as the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, the Pomegranate Squad and Shtreiml.

A centerpiece of the festival, Smolkin says, is an exhibit on Yiddish radio from the '30s to the '50s. "With a new radio program and theatre performance directed by Theresa Tova, Ashkenaz celebrates the forgotten geniuses and important recordings of this often overlooked chapter of the Canadian experience.

"While researching Yiddish radio, we came across documents from the '30s just sitting in boxes in people's homes. For us, this was a magical experience."

A small but important part of the festival is a tribute to the late writer Avrom Karpinovitsh, who was known for recording the language of the people in the streets of Vilnus, Smolkin says. "I had the chance to meet him in Lithuania, and since his death, we have essentially lost part of our history."

The "Reel Ashkenaz" film series includes screenings of the 1923 silent film East and West, the French-Czech horror classic The Golem, and the musical The Singing Blacksmith, starring Cantor Moishe Oysher in the role of a hard-drinking, womanizing blacksmith struggling to resist temptation. In the 1949 film Catskill Honeymoon, a Jewish resort hotel celebrates a pair of longtime customers' 50th wedding anniversary by staging an old-fashioned Borscht Belt show.

Also featured at the festival are a literary program and visual art exhibits, including the touring exhibit "And I Still See Their Faces: Images of Polish Jews," which calls on the public to look into the eyes of Poland's Jews before the Holocaust to see the scientists, poets, artists, doctors, lawyers, rogues and adventurers they might have been, and to contemplate the human promise that was lost, Smolkin says.

Participatory events are an important part of Ashkenaz festival, says Smolkin. Patrons can march along with hundreds of artists, musicians and stiltwalkers in the Ashkenaz Pageant created by Shadowland Theatre, or partake in a spiritual Havdalah ceremony.

Some events require tickets. For more information, call 416-973-4000 or visit www.ashkenazfestival.com.

A taste of Israel in downtown Toronto

Celebrating the spirit of Israel, the Shuk in the Park is a free outdoor festival that features a marketplace of Israeli goods, live music and kosher food.

The Shuk, now in its third year, takes place on Sunday, Aug. 29, in Suydam Park in Spadina Village, at Spadina and Strathearn roads, and will be on, rain or shine, from noon until 6 p.m.

One can stroll the marketplace shopping for authentic Israeli goods, gorge on falafel while playing shesh besh (backgammon), jam in the drumming circle with Living Rhythm, practise belly dancing or smoke exotic tobacco with a hookah at the Nargila Café.

Shuk in the Park features live music by Bais Groove, the Russell Leon Band and Touch of Klez, all presented by Magen Boys High Energy Entertainment.

Ephraim Shoham, Israel's trade commissioner to Canada will be in attendance.

According to event spokesperson Vivian Ringwald, "Shuk in the Park is a great way to spend a summer afternoon. With over 40 vendors and community booths retailing everything from body art to burgers, there is something for everyone and for all ages.

JWI weekend focuses on violence against women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A weekend for women in Niagara Falls, Oct. 22 to 24, sponsored by Jewish Women International of Canada, will focus on the issue of violence against women.

Titled "The Voice of Women… One Voice Many Choices" the weekend will feature talks on domestic violence and women's human rights and issues.

JWI/C director Penny Krowitz said that addressing domestic violence has always been a priority of her organization, but it is also doing research on violence in the workplace, as well in sports, hospitals and on campuses.

"We plan to discuss what is happening out there and determine the needs of women.

"Our goal is to do the initial research, and then put together task forces with people in various areas. From there, we will gather a body of knowledge and set out some initiatives," said Krowitz.

A keynote speaker is Amy Robbins Ellison, a cardiac anesthesiologist and a survivor of domestic abuse. "She will set the tone of the conference. We want to impress that there is no stereotypical abused woman," said Krowitz.

Also on the program is educator Channa Sargon, who will discuss the achievements of Jewish women in history; Ruth Flicker, president of RRF Human Development Consultants Inc., who will conduct a session on strategies for the future; and Marylou McPhedron, a lawyer who has fought for women's rights. There will also be wen-do self-defence workshops.

The weekend, chaired by Pat Wolfson, is open to women of all ages. "[By participating], we have the opportunity to learn a great deal, make a difference, be part of social change and correct social injustices," said Wolfson.

The event, which will be held at the Renaissance Fallsview Hotel, costs $395 based on double occupancy. For information, call 416-630-9313 or www.jwicanada.com.

OSCE urges freer trade for Middle East

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) has adopted a resolution that urges its constituent states to foster economic prosperity in Arab countries of the Mediterranean, in part by pushing for expanded and freer trade.

The resolution suggests free trade agreements with Middle Eastern nations would help modernize their economies while laying the groundwork for political reform.

"Small concrete immediate steps can be taken to build a 'freer trade' zone in the Middle East that can only offer opportunities and help to foster a modernizing economic environment that can lift the economic plight of all states and in the process transform the political climate for all citizens in the Middle East," said Senator Jerry Grafstein, the OSCE parliamentary assembly's treasurer and sponsor of the resolution.

Grafstein said Canada, which has concluded free trade agreements with the United States, Mexico and Israel, should be a leader in convincing Mideastern states to reform their economies.

He said Canada was in the process of entering free trade talks with Jordan and parliamentarians from Mediterranean countries like Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Egypt did not object to the OSCE initiative.

"I think this is a tremendous opportunity to bring the political reformation and modernization of the Middle East," he said.

"Modernizing the Middle East will bring greater stability" while reducing security costs in North America, he added.

While hopeful that progress may be made in opening Mideast economies to trade, Grafstein acknowledged that many of the region's governments retain their grip on power through top-down control of the economy.

The OSCE trade resolution was adopted at the organization's recent meeting in Edinburgh, Scotland. Follow-up discussions will be held in Rhodes, Greece, in late September.

community's advocacy arm on Israel, to strengthen its outreach efforts.

Before CIJA's creation, advocacy organizations including Congress, the CIC and national campus organizations subsisted on a combined allocation of $5.3 million. Since then, the agencies' combined budget has grown to $10.4 million, while the dollar amount spend on administration has not grown, said Belzberg. In addition, CIJA has distributed "venture capital" sums to grassroots organizations with programs that meet CIJA's goals, he said.

In the last year, "a real effort [was made] to find a dialogue with the [political] left," while outreach efforts have focused on the Chinese, Sikh and Italian communities, as well as a number of churches.

On the campus front, CIJA has funded the hiring of seven advocacy experts in seven Canadian cities, who assist local student groups and address anti-Israel agitation on campus. CIJA has also recruited Jewish Agency shlichim (emissaries) who provide students with information, education, resources and someone to talk to when they experience difficulties. Professors at various schools have agreed to act as advocates in confronting anti-Israel colleagues, said CIJA CEO Hershell Ezrin.

"I would not say we've solved the problem, but I'd say there's a slightly higher level of comfort on campus," he added.

Even at Montreal's Concordia University, Jewish students are experiencing "a more reasonable environment where [they] don't fear expressing themselves as Jews and discussion is more civilized," said Ezrin.

At York University, where a student slate unseated an pro-Palestinian student government, CIJA "helped create a better environment for all students" and "empowered" Jewish students to get involved in politics, Cummings said.

> 'It's up to the indvidual to get informed and get involved'

Before the recent federal election, CIJA's affiliated organizations, CIC and CJC, met with the three national party leaders to discuss issues of concern to the Jewish community and CIJA encouraged its political action committees (PACs) to become politically involved, regardless of the party each PAC member supported. During the campaign, CIJA's website experienced 100,000 hits a day.

"The ultimate goal of CIJA PAC would to be act as a partisan entity that would support candidates," Ezrin said.

Changing public perceptions of Israel will take a multi-year effort and a substantial financial commitment. "The first tranche is to influence the influencers and to educate the broader amcha [community]. But it is not something that can be done overnight," Ezrin said.

Relationships that were taken for granted, with labour, with those in the academic world, will be the subject of renewed focus, said Cummings.

Each member of the Jewish community has a role to play in advancing Israel's cause, said Belzberg. "We provide the resources, but it is up to the individual to get informed and get involved and do something."

The Israeli cat is back

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Laura Elliott has been reunited with her Israeli-born cat Lily after a six-week separation.

Lily, the stray cat Elliott adopted and brought with her from Israel, escaped in late June from a cage in the cargo hold of an El Al passenger jet and bolted to freedom when ground crew opened the hatch to retrieve passengers' luggage.

Lily lived by her wits on the grounds of Pearson International Airport until she was trapped earlier this month in a construction compound on the airport grounds.

In a letter to John Meehan, an official with the Greater Toronto Airport Authority (GTAA), which operates Pearson, Elliott said "I am eternally grateful [to GTAA staff] for all their time and effort in helping to locate my beloved pet. It has been an extremely stressful time for me and thanks to everyone at the GTAA, I can finally relax and get on with my life."

Elliott had lived in Israel for five years, working in the venture capital field and volunteering in animal rescue. She grew attached to two cats and bought $200 (US) tickets for each of them when she returned to Toronto.

She was angry at El Al when she learned Lily had escaped, saying the airline should have ensured that Lily was brought to her in her cage. El Al argued it had done all it was contracted to do – transport the cat to her final destination – and was not responsible if the cage provided by Elliott was faulty.

Elliott said she would like El Al to compensate her for the mental anguish and costs she incurred in losing Lily for the six week period.

Rosh Hashanah and Continuity...

This time of year in the Jewish calendar is all about beginnings and recommitments. Thankfully, once again, we are given the opportunity to begin anew and to recommit to the people, the values and the way of life that are most precious to us. If staying connected to the Jewish community in Canada and abroad is part of that new beginning for you , there is no better vehicle for doing so than The Canadian Jewish News.

As a way of helping individuals launch their new beginnings, The CJN is introducing a special continuity subscription offer in time for Rosh Hashanah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $19.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication.

Could there be a better gift at Rosh Hashanah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

The editor.

For the sake of the children

The two youngsters, whose unaffected curiosity is flawlessly captured by the camera, are children of Israel.

The cloudless, deep blue sky behind them belies the storm of terror that has broken upon the land these past three years. Alas, there appears no imminent sign on the horizon that the storm will abate.

Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky recently told a Toronto audience about a new, terror-induced phenomenon that has taken hold in Jerusalem.

Members of families leave notes of love whenever they leave the house. However mundane and routine the reason for the departure – a child going to school, a parent to work or a sibling merely going shopping – a note left behind, usually on the kitchen table, so that no words might be left unsaid in the cruel event that the child or the parent does not return home.

We therefore greet the coming year as we did last the one: with hope in our hearts and a prayer on our lips that this year will bring the people of Israel closer to peace.

Rosh Hashanah is the holiday of judgment. We are sustained by the traditional belief that one of the key underpinnings of our world is justice, even though it is not always apparent to our merely human sensibility and understanding.

But where is the justice, we cry out, when suicide bombers wantonly and deliberately slaughter children returning from an outing at the Kotel?

Where is the justice, we cry out, when the United Nations General Assembly protects the chief planner and practitioner of terrorism?

Where is the justice, we cry out, over and over again?

Kids4Peace promotes interfaith education

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

For Gaia, 12, peace in the Middle East no longer seems like a lost cause.

After participating in Kids4Peace, an interfaith education initiative of St. George's College in Jerusalem, Gaia, a Jewish Israeli, said her experience of religious tolerance has strengthened her commitment to Israeli-Palestinian coexistence.

For 11 days in August, Gaia and 23 Jewish, Christian and Muslim children aged from 10 to 12 took part in a program designed to nurture the participants as pioneers of peace.

The program, which focused on exploring the realities, traditions, languages and dreams of each faith group, brought 12 Israeli children from the Jerusalem and Galilee areas and 12 Canadians together in Toronto.

"I think it's important to have things like Kids4Peace because of the very difficult situation in Israel that we're in," said Gaia through a translator. "Anything where Arabs and Jews can work together for peace is good and contributes [to bettering the situation]. Before I came, I thought differently about Christians and Muslims. Now I see what's common between us."

Henry Carse, director of special programs at St. George's College, founded Kids4Peace in 2002. "That year in particular was a very difficult time in the Middle East. There was an escalation of violence and hostility between Israelis and Palestinians," he said. "As an educator, I thought it was important to respond to the conflict by creating an atmosphere of trust to allow the children to meet each other across the lines.

"Israel is a segregated society where Arab and Jewish children are divided by schools, language and lifestyles. This separation lends itself to conflict. If you don't know your neighbours, you feel threatened by them."

He said Kids4Peace is seen by teachers, parents and religious community leaders in Jerusalem as a way to bridge the gap. "It's about interfaith education for peace. Education is at the heart of the program, the goal is peace and the tool is interfaith dialogue. We want to form a generation of leaders for tomorrow."

After arriving in Toronto and spending the night at St. Dunstan's Church, the Israelis befriended the Jewish, Muslim and Christian Canadians. The group of 24 children, along with their religious advisers and program organizers, then spent a week "away from tension" at Outward Bound summer camp in northern Ontario, Carse said.

The camp's philosophy was "challenge by choice," he said. Through physical, emotional and intellectual team-building, including exercises at the ropes course and other activities on the lake and on land, the Kids4Peace participants quickly became "peace-pals."

At the end of the wilderness session, the Jews, Christians and Muslims gathered under "the Abraham tent" – a tent pitched to show that "we are all children of Abraham" – to watch presentations created by each religious group about their faith traditions, Carse said.

Melanie, an 11-year-old Christian participant from Toronto, said the Outward Bound staff encouraged co-operation and respect. "At the camp, they wanted us all to get along. There's no reason to fight, and all the kids agreed with that."

Back in Toronto, the group toured the CN Tower, Centre Island and Niagara Falls. On the last day of the program, they visited Holy Trinity Anglican Church, the Jaffari Islamic Centre and Temple Har Zion. At the houses of worship, a priest, an imam and a rabbi taught the children respectively about Christianity, Islam and Judaism.

Sarah, an 11-year-old Muslim participant from Toronto, said the religious introductions opened her eyes to faiths other than her own."I had never been to a church or a synagogue before, and I found it very interesting."

In Toronto, the Israeli participants were hosted by the families of their Canadian counterparts. "Kids4Peace is about making friends and establishing more personal relationships," said Carse.

Jenna, an 11-year-old Jewish participant from Toronto, agreed. "I really enjoyed having a girl from Israel stay at my house. You get to know them better that way. Her mother was the Jewish adviser on the trip and her father was the Muslim adviser."

Carse said proselytizing or any form of religious pressure is "completely out of place in Kids4Peace." Politics did not come into play in the program, as Kids4Peace focused on "the development of sustainable relationships.

"The kids got along great. There was language sharing and a deep respect for each other's faith traditions. The only challenges we came across were between the kids as kids – not between the kids as Arabs and Jews."

Carse said Kids4Peace has met his expectations, but he will not be satisfied until the program is followed up. "This is only the beginning of a process of dialogue and integrity building. I want to continue developing the program for as long as I'm standing."

For information about Kids4Peace, contact David Ross at idavidross@aol.com.

Montreal federation invests $3 million in school security

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – FEDERATION CJA is spending $3 million on upgrading security at Jewish day schools and day-care centres this year, following an assessment of each institution's needs by a private American security firm.

President Sylvain Abitbol said the federation will implement the recommendations of International Security Associates, based in Columbus, Ohio, which conducted a site-by-site audit over the summer.

The firm was selected because it has experience working with Jewish community groups, including other federations, in the United States, he said.

The $3 million will be disbursed among 22 schools and centres on 40 campuses.

What form the additional security takes will vary according to the school, he said. While Abitbol did not want to disclose details, he said security will be "visible and invisible."

This is most the federation has ever invested for security at schools, he said, and is a result of the April 5 firebombing of the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs (UTT).

Prior to the incident, security was primarily the responsibility of individual schools.

"With the start of the new school year, we want students, parents and faculty to know that we are taking the steps necessary to protect our community and secure our future." The majority of schools open at the end of this month.

Immediately after the firebombing, the federation paid to hire private uniformed guards at all the Jewish schools that requested them until the end of the school year.

Whether guards will be on duty this year is up to individual schools, Abitbol said.

The federation is also in the "final stages" of hiring a security co-ordinator, a new staff position, Abitbol said. That person's job will be to act as a consultant to schools, as well as other community institutions.

Abitbol said additional allocations have not been made for security at other community institutions, including the federation's own agencies. "For the moment, our priority is the schools," he said.

Security, of course, remains a major concern for the Jewish community as a whole. On Aug. 31, its standing committee on security, co-chaired by Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, will hold a meeting with police to review measures in place at synagogues and other institutions, as is customary before the High Holy Days.

Aboriginal group returns from Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The land and people of Israel made a strong impression on Rev. Raymond McLean and a group of his aboriginal congregants who recently returned from their first visit to the Holy Land.

"The land was breathtaking," said Red River College student Clarence Mason, who is originally from the First Nations community of Ste. Therese Point in northern Manitoba.

"It was a wonderful experience for me. I wanted to see for myself the places where the stories in the Bible took place. The trip brought history alive for me."

Pensioner Christine Sumner was also deeply impressed by the beauty of the land, as well as the friendliness of the people.

"It is hard to put into words," said Sumner, a Winnipeg resident who is originally from Dauphin River. "It was amazing seeing the Bible come to life."

Sumner and Mason were two out of almost 30 people who signed on for the trip, which was organized by Rev. McLean, the leader of South East Aboriginal Ministries congregation in downtown Winnipeg.

Rev. McLean organized the visit after going himself last year as part of a tour consisting of nine First Nations leaders and educators, on a mission organized by B'nai Brith Canada.

The mission was B'nai Brith's response to comments praising Hitler made by former national First Nations leader David Ahenakew in January 2003, said Alan Yusim, director of B'nai Brith's Winnipeg office.

"Our goal was to strengthen the relationship between the First Nations and Jewish communities," Yusim said. "In addition to partnering in fighting hatred, we organized a week-long human rights study trip to Israel for First Nations leaders."

Rev. McLean said he was so taken with the trip that he wanted to go back with some of his congregants and other interested First Nations people so he could share his experiences. B'nai Brith helped organize the tour.

The nine-day trip earlier this month included stops in Jerusalem, Mount Zion, the Dead Sea and Yad Vashem.

"Yad Vashem was a very moving experience," Rev. McLean said. "I never realized before how devastating the Holocaust was for the Jewish people. I had read about it and heard about it, but Yad Vashem really opened my eyes. We were able to see what the Jewish people had gone through and how they have rebuilt their culture and their ancient language in their homeland."

Rev. McLean said he looks forward to leading another First Nations group to Israel next year.

In the meantime, Yusim said, B'nai Brith leaders are making plans to visit First Nations communities this fall and meet with native leaders to discuss common issues and concerns.

Olympic boycott is the lesser Iranian evil

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Iran's insulting boycott of Israel at the Athens Olympics on Aug. 15, when Arash Miresmaeili refused to engage Ehudi Vaks in a judo match, was well-covered by the Canadian media. But this story should not overshadow a far more serious conflict between the two countries: the threat of Iran developing nuclear weapons specifically for use against Israel.

In a front-page story in the Globe and Mail on Aug. 16, Christie Blatchford eloquently described Vaks' reaction to the boycott: "He was utterly crushed by Mr. Miresmaeili's failure to fight, and by Iran's refusal to recognize Israel. "It's funny," he said, near tears. "They don't have the right to not recognize us. Israel is a democracy; Iran is not… So I feel terrible on a personal level and on a national level, as well. I don't think we need to have a quarrel between our countries.'"

On Aug. 17, the Globe editorial, "Iran's Olympic snub," said that "Iran has sullied the Olympic ideal, and should be held to account." A similar editorial in the National Post on Aug. 17, "Iran's insult to the Olympic ideals," said: "The actions of Mr. Miresmaeili represent not merely a stunt pulled by an individual athlete, however, but adherence to an official policy of discrimination maintained by the Iranian government, one that thumbs its nose at the Olympic ideals."

Other strong columns condemning Iran's actions included Rosie Dimanno's "Shame on IOC for its silence" in the Toronto Star on Aug. 17, Steve Simmons' "Real Story? Politics" in the Toronto Sun, also on Aug. 17. On Aug. 18, the Ottawa Citizen came out with a stinging editorial. "Pity the Iranians" arguing that "hatred of Israel remains the strongest unifying force in Iran… Iran is a totalitarian theocracy, where the ruling mullahs feel constant pressure from an unhappy, oppressed populace."

While the criticism of Iran's Olympic boycott was welcome, these reports should not be allowed to eclipse a far more significant story: Iran's likely development of nuclear weapons and its threats to use them against Israel.

Iran recently tested its latest Shahab-3 missile, which has a range of up to 1,300 kilometres, well within reach of Israel. While Israel has not specifically threatened to attack Iran's nuclear reactor, it has said that it will not allow Iran to acquire a nuclear bomb. And that has been used as an excuse for Iran – which has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction – to crank up the rhetoric. An Aug. 18 report by Ali Akbar Dareini of the Associated Press quoted a statement by the deputy chief of the "elite Revolutionary Guards," Brig.-Gen. Mohammad Baqer Zolqadr: "If Israel fires a missile into the Bushehr nuclear power plant, it has to say goodbye forever to its Dimona nuclear facility, where it produces and stockpiles nuclear weapons."

In 1981, Israel destroyed Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor, incurring the world's wrath. Following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990, and subsequent revelations about Iraq's revived nuclear weapons program, some of the states that had previously condemned Israel changed their tune. They acknowledged that Israel's prescient action may have prevented a recklessly aggressive Saddam Hussein from unleashing nuclear weapons on Iraq's enemies, including Israel.

Iran has explicitly violated its obligations as a member of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT). Many countries, foremost among them the United States, warn that Iran poses an enormous risk to international peace and security should it acquire nuclear weapons.

Iran's nuclear goal has been the subject of some attention in the Canadian media, including a June 16 Globe and Mail editorial, "Iran's nuclear ambitions," a July 14 National Post op-ed piece by Gerald Steinberg, "When will the West confront Iran?" and Samuel Segev's Aug. 18 Winnipeg Free Press article, "Israel sees a nuclear Iran as greatest threat."

So while the Olympic scandal is a compelling story, it's just a small symptom of a far more looming threat that Iran presents to Israel, and indeed the world.

New prostate cancer gene discovered

MONTREAL – Montreal's Jewish General Hospital and Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital are among the health-care institutions participating in a study that has discovered a new prostate cancer gene.

Researchers at the Translational Genomics Research Institute (TGen) in Phoenix, Ariz., have found a new way to speed the discovery of genes that suppress tumours and in the process identified a gene that appears to be important in prostate cancer.

The findings appeared in the current issue of the journal Nature Genetics.

The gene, not previously known to be a tumour suppressor, most likely plays a role in regulating and maintaining normal tissue organization. The researchers have shown that the gene, known as EphB2, is inactivated in prostate cancer.

This is the first time abnormalities in the gene have been linked to cancer. Researchers believe loss of the gene's function leads to disorganization of cells and also encourages the growth and survival of prostate cancer cells.

"This finding provides critical insight into the factors that cause prostate cancer, which can be used for development of additional diagnostics and therapeutics for prostate cancer," said Dr. Spyro Mousses, head of TGen's Cancer Drug Development Laboratory and the paper's senior author. Much additional research is warranted to determine the extent of its involvement in prostate cancer and other cancers as well."

Dr. John Carpten, senior investigator at TGen, director of its Genetic Basis of Human Disease Division and head of the TGen Prostate Cancer Research Unit said the "findings represent a significant advancement in prostate cancer research, as the number of current treatment options for advanced prostate cancer remains limited."

"The discovery of mutations in this gene allows us the opportunity to explore a new path towards treating a significant number of men with advanced prostate cancer. As TGen's mission is to translate laboratory findings into the clinic, we hope to use this information to ultimately help provide prostate cancer patients more treatment options and a better quality of life."

Johns Hopkins University and Howard Hughes researcher Dr. Bert Vogelstein said the "work reveals a new mechanism by which cancer cells can evade normal tissue architecture, which is a hallmark of tumour development. While further research is needed to reveal the full impact of EphB2 on prostate cancer, every step helps when fighting this disease."

According to Mousses, complex diseases such as prostate cancer involve more than one gene – often many – and a host of environmental factors, which makes them particularly hard to investigate.

The study also involved researchers from the University of Turku in Finland, the National Human Genome Research Institute in Bethesda, Md., Tampere University of Technology and University Hospital in Finland, Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine in Baltimore, Md., and the University of Basel in Switzerland.

Remembering Zipporah

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

For too many years, Lithuanian-born Reuven Blium, new living in Toronto, has harboured a secret. At last he feels free to disclose what happened at a seemingly idyllic Jewish orphanage and summer camp in the countryside. And he wants an opportunity to commemorate the ultimate sacrifice of one heroic woman, known to him only as Zipporah.

Reuven Blium

"I must do it," he says. "I can't let her be forgotten!"

In Kaunas, Lithuania, population about 300,000 at the start of World War II, of whom Blium estimates some 100,000 were Jewish, there was a welcoming white three-storey building, The Jewish Children's Home, an orphanage under the auspices of the Jewish community, which sheltered youngsters from infants to seven years of age.

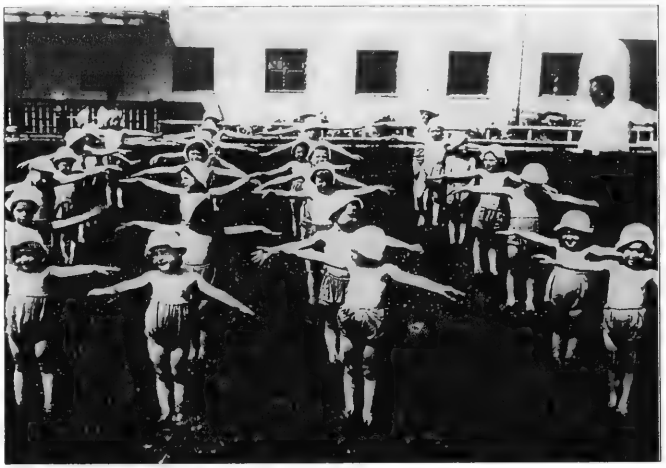
Approximately 10 kilometres outside the city, in a cottage-resort area, stood a substantial building used as a summer camp for boys from seven to 17. This was linked to a second orphanage for older children, administered by another arm of the Jewish community.

In both orphanages, the children were well cared for and given an education, regular exercise and treats such as outdoor picnics.

In 1940, there was a radical change in the young children's orphanage when a staff member who was married to an underground Communist leader (both were Jewish) was appointed director.

Communists had begun to infiltrate the land, and the Soviets, formerly allied with the Germans, were becoming their enemies. In the spring of 1941, when the tension between Germans and Soviets was mounting, the director, fearing for the children's safety, took them to the camp in the country.

On June 22, war erupted between the Germans and the Soviets in Lithuania. Three or four days later, the Germans occupied Kaunas. Lithuanians entered the summer camp, gave orders to liquidate all the youngsters, and dispersed their Jewish caregivers to the ghetto in Kaunas. The non-Jewish workers were told to go home.



The children in the Jewish Children's Home, a pre-World War II orphanage in Kaunas, Lithuania, for boys and girls to seven years of age, are seen participating in outdoor activities in front of the home.

Soviet officials commanded the director who had tried to save the children by bringing them to the camp, and her husband, to leave the children and proceed deep into Soviet territory. She was mobilized as a medic with the Red Army and worked tirelessly among the troops, while her husband was sent back to help organize partisan units in Lithuania.

Only one caregiver, Zipporah, defying orders, refused to abandon the youngsters. Stating adamantly that this was her destiny, she died with most of the children in a nearby building Blium refers to as the death centre.

The older boys, including Blium, were taken by one of their leaders to the railway station. He accompanied them on the train into the Soviet Union, and many survived the war.

At the end of hostilities, Blium returned to Kaunas. The white building had been converted to a children's hospital, which still functions as such to this day. The words, Jewish Children's Home, printed in Yiddish and Lithuanian across the front, had been erased.

The summer camp structure, so solidly built, had vanished. Not even the foundation was visible. There was no indication of what had transpired there. But Blium was entrusted with a prewar photo album that had been left behind. In it are pictures of happier days – Zipporah tending the three- and four-year-old girls, a scene portraying about 100 children in front of the home, little ones at play – all gone. Vibrant beings obliterated.

The director and her husband who had wanted to save the children but took their orders from the Soviets survived the war, although they are no longer alive.

Blium is determined that Zipporah will be remembered. He will contribute what he can and hopes that other survivors of the train trip that took them into the Soviet Union – now just a few elderly men scattered throughout Israel, Canada and the United States – plus perhaps others who have been moved by Zipporah's courage, will commission a sculpture or other remembrance in her name.

Gathering round the holiday table

By NORENE GILLETZ

The High Holy Days begin on Wednesday evening, Sept. 15, erev Rosh Hashanah, with all its special foods and traditions. Apples are dipped in honey in the hopes of a sweet year ahead. Challahs are coiled into a circle and often contain raisins, symbolizing wishes for a well-rounded, sweet and wholesome year.

The daunting task of preparing festive dishes for your holiday table can be overwhelming, but not as overwhelming as creating a top-quality cookbook packed with triple-tested recipes. Shawna Magence and Carol Lesser were the coordinators for Gatherings: Creative Kosher Cooking from our Families to Yours, ($34.99) a fundraising project of the parents of Netivot HaTorah Day School in Thornhill.

Gatherings is not your usual fundraising cookbook. It is a top-quality, professionally designed book, with 300 luscious recipes contributed by friends and family of children attending the school. It has a flat binding and contains fabulous photos and terrific cooking tips. Since Gatherings was published last October, more than $100,000 has been raised as a result of a lot of hard work, dedication and passion.

I spoke with Shawna Magence, one of the driving forces behind Gatherings, and asked her for some of her strategies when preparing for her own holiday table. Magence is incredibly organized - she has to be. A busy mom with four children, she works two days a week managing a law office, is the president of Emunah Women and is actively involved with Netivot HaTorah.

She told me she doesn't cook at the last minute, but not months in advance either. She serves "not less than 18, because that's how many fit at my table." Sometimes she will have a kids' table. Magence always sets the table the night before. She likes to prepare recipes that look beautiful, taste incredible and are easy to make. She does all her preparation in advance, so that once she sits down at the table, she can enjoy the meal with her family and friends.

"The recipes in Gatherings are traditional, but with a twist," Magence said. "All the recipes are kosher, so everyone can eat them, whether they keep kosher or not. The recipes are easy enough for a novice, yet gourmet enough for the gourmet cook! There are lots of salads that can be served at room temperature and are ideal do-ahead dishes that don't need to be warmed up.

"Pictures in most cookbooks are not always reproducible, but anyone who prepares our recipes can make them look just as gorgeous as the ones in the pictures. The recipe for Three-Coloured Fish Loaf came from an incredible cook who is a grandparent of one of the children in the school. It looks fabulous, is so easy to make and is a wonderful way to get the kids to eat their carrots. The Double Mushroom Chicken is incredible. Most kids will not eat mushrooms, but they don't know mushrooms are in it. They think it's made with bread crumbs!"

Gatherings is available at most Judaica stores, Chapters, Indigo, or by calling 905-771-1234, ext. 303 or 416-226-2466. Here are some of Magence's suggestions for upcoming gatherings around your holiday table. Enjoy!

THREE-COLOURED FISH LOAF

This elegant appetizer looks gourmet but is very easy to prepare and delicious! Try this terrific serving tip to impress your guests: serve horseradish in carved-out veggies like radishes, cucumber or zucchini.

1½ lbs. frozen fish loaf, defrosted
1 egg, beaten
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. garlic powder
½ tsp. onion powder
pepper to taste
1 (300-g) box chopped spinach, defrosted and drained
3 medium-sized carrots, cooked and mashed

Preheat oven to 350. In a large bowl, combine defrosted fish with egg, sugar, salt, garlic powder, onion powder and pepper. Divide mixture in half. Press one half into a 4½x8½-inch loaf pan. Divide remaining mixture in half. Mix spinach with one half of mixture and carrots with the other. Spread the spinach mixture over plain fish in loaf pan. Then spread carrot mixture over the spinach mixture. Bake uncovered for 1 hour. Serves 8 to 10. Preparation time: 20 minutes.

DOUBLE MUSHROOM CHICKEN

This chicken is superb. Your guests won't be able to guess what the great topping is made of.

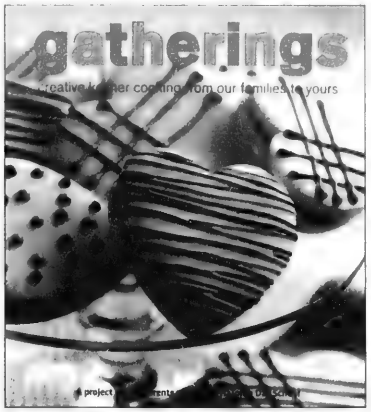
Sauce:
1 clove garlic, minced
1 tsp. olive oil
6 to 7 mushrooms, sliced
1 tbsp. cornstarch dissolved in 1 cup chicken broth
salt and pepper to taste

2 (3 lb. each) chickens cut into 8ths (or boneless and skinless chicken breasts or thighs)
1 (1.4-oz.) pkg. porcini mushrooms, dried
½ cup dry bread crumbs
½ cup mayonnaise
2 tsp. Dijon mustard
1½ tsp. paprika
¼ to ½ tsp. curry powder (optional)
1 tsp. additional paprika

Preheat oven to 375. In a nonstick saucepan over medium heat, saute garlic in olive oil. Add mushrooms. Add cornstarch-chicken broth mixture, salt and pepper and bring to a boil, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Set aside.

Rinse chicken pieces. Pat dry. Set aside on parchment paper placed in a large pan.

Lightly run cold water through porcini mushrooms and drain well. Place them on paper towels and pat until absolutely dry. (Air-dry for a while.) Cut any large pieces by hand. Put them in a food processor. Process well. Add bread crumbs. Process until mixture becomes crumb-like.



Combine mayonnaise, mustard, 1½ tsp. paprika and curry powder. Coat chicken pieces, returning the coated pieces to the pan. Sprinkle with mushroom crumbs and additional paprika to give colour.

Place chicken, uncovered, in oven. After 20 to 25 minutes, baste with half the mushroom sauce. After another 30 minutes, add remaining sauce. Do not overcook chicken. Depending on the size of the chicken pieces, chicken should be cooked for about an hour and then checked. Serves 10 to 12. To reheat, cover pan with foil. Preparation time: 25 to 30 minutes.

PECAN PUMPKIN LOAF

This is a wonderful recipe for the upcoming holidays, especially for Sukkot. It can be served as a dessert and also makes a great side dish for those who are allergic to eggs. You can substitute chocolate chips for the pecans, or just add them to the recipe. You can also bake the recipe in muffin tins.

3 cups flour
2 cups sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cloves
1 cup oil
1 (16-oz.) can pumpkin puree
1 cup pecans, chopped

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 5 mini-loaf pans (5¾x3¼ inches). In a large mixing bowl, using an electric or hand-held mixer, mix flour, sugar, baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon, salt and cloves. Add oil and pumpkin puree. Mix until smooth. Stir in pecans.

Pour batter into greased loaf pans. Bake for 50 to 60 minutes.

Literary magazine offers a 'warehouse' of ideas

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It started with a whisper.

"That's going to be the lead," said Benjamin Leszcz confidently, referring to the way he anticipated – correctly – that this article would begin.

Leszcz, 22, and Neil Rogachevsky, 21, are the founders and editors of entrepôt (www.entrepot.net), an eclectic literary magazine for university students and recent graduates. The name is French for "warehouse," representing a warehouse of ideas, the editors say.

In high school, the pair got their journalistic start writing for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Fireside CHAT. Later, in university, Leszcz and Rogachevsky, who've known each other more than a decade and became friends in their late teens, wrote for their respective student newspapers.

For the past year, Leszcz, a 2003 graduate of Dalhousie University with a BA in contemporary studies and international development studies, has honed his journalistic skills at Saturday Night magazine, first as a summer intern and most recently as assistant editor, a position to which he was promoted in March. "I've learned a ton," he said.

Leszcz and Rogachevsky both credit CHAT writing teacher Carla Pearson, among others, for her influence on their writing.

They also had strong influences at home: Leszcz' mother is a math teacher at CHAT, and his father, a psychiatrist, is writing a book. Leszcz' grandfather, Rabbi Shalom Rappaport, now retired from Winnipeg's Rosh Pina Congregation, was also an influence.

Rogachevsky credits his literary bent to his librarian mother and businessman father. "They're big readers."

Rogachevsky, who has edited Camp Ramah's newspaper, Kol Ramah, is a recent graduate of McGill University, where he majored in intellectual history. Both he and Leszcz have also worked for campus papers and academic journals.

The plans for entrepôt, which is distributed free on and around Canadian university campuses, grew from a whispered conversation in a library when Leszcz was at McGill as a visiting student. "I think we started off brainstorming for a column we could write together for the McGill Daily," said Leszcz.

Thus far, they've published two issues and are aiming to publish a third this coming winter. The magazine is starting to attract some advertising, but funding is 80 per cent grant-based, Leszcz said.

The most recent issue, a 42-page glossy, covers a wide range of subjects, including a short story, an article on the history of the ukulele, and a reflection by a fledgling journalist in Senegal. Entrepôt articles range from 400 words to a hefty 3,000 for some features.

The editors' criteria for submissions include "intelligent, original, critical writing; a strongly well-reasoned, thoughtful piece," said Leszcz, who added that the magazine was created with no ideological agenda. "We strive for diversity of opinion, religion, ethnicity [from] all over the country. The publication has no official stance on anything… It's the quality of the writing [that counts]."

Although they can't afford to pay contributors, Rogachevsky said he believes students see their writing as an opportunity to gain experience and acquire published clippings.

"Much of what forms the character of this project is the objective of publishing the best student writing that exists in Canada," said Leszcz. "If we started paying writers, we'd be competing with every other magazine. What makes us unique is that we feature writers who aren't writing for a living yet – or maybe never will be – but this great number of talented students is looking for an avenue to being published."

The magazine offers a niche for young writers excluded from mainstream papers and limited by space constraints and demands for topicality in campus papers, said Rogachevsky. "We want to make this the best magazine possible."

Heart & Stroke walk set for Sept. 26-

Thousands of women in 36 communities across Ontario, along with their family and friends, will put on their walking shoes in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation on Sept. 26.

The annual Cheerios Mother Daughter Walk for Heart & Stroke is part of a nationwide event that raises funds to support research into the root causes of heart disease and stroke among women.

Last year, the walk brought in more than $2.5 million, and this year's goal is $3.3 million.

According to Heart and Stroke Foundation literature, more women than men are now dying from heart disease and stroke.

With our aging population, it says, it is critical to understand the underlying causes of these diseases. Raising money through events such as this walk is vital for the research and health promotion activities of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

The walk will take place in five spots in the Greater Toronto Area. At Woodbine Park, participants will walk along the shore of Lake Ontario, through Ashbridges Bay Park and east along the boardwalk, following either a 4-km or an 8-km route.

Check-in time is 11 a.m. and start time is 1 p.m. There will be activities to entertain walkers and their supporters, and at the Health and Wellness Expo tents, visitors can receive information about heart disease and healthy living.

At Ajax Rotary Park, participants can walk either 2 km or 4 km. Check-in time is 8 a.m., and the walk will start at 10 a.m. Clowns, face painters, a live band, food, prizes, goodie bags and a health fair will add to the fun.

In Etobicoke at Centennial Park, walkers can choose from a 3-km or a 6-km route. Check-in starts at 9:30 a.m, and the walk will begin at 10:45 a.m. Kids will find lots to amuse them including airbrush tattoos, and information about heart health will be available at an information booth.

At Toogood Pond, Main Street, Unionville, participants will have the choice of either a 3-km or a 6-km walk. Check-in time is 8 a.m., and the walk will begin at 10 a.m. At the Kid's Zone, children can take part in games and face painting, and adults can check their blood pressure at a special clinic.

At Fairy Lake in Newmarket there are two routes, 2 km

Organ donation 'a big mitzvah'

Yet, Israeli rate is among the lowest in industrialized world

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When 17-year-old Tani Goodman died in a tragic kibbutz accident two years ago, his Orthodox family had no reservations about donating his organs to give others a new lease on life.

"It's what he would have done… and we felt it was the right thing to do," said Tani's sister, Yael, in a phone interview from Israel.

"It's an amazing mitzvah."

Tani's organs helped save four people's lives and provided health benefits to six people.

The Goodmans have kept in contact with the beneficiaries of Tani's organs and are actively involved in promoting the cause of organ donation.

"We understand nothing will bring my brother back, but knowing his organs are in other people is a good feeling," Yael said. "His spirit is living – the spirit of giving."

While the Goodmans' story has a somewhat heartwarming ending, statistics show that organ donation rates in Israel are among the lowest in the industrialized world, roughly one-third the rate of western European countries.

Every year, as many as 80 Israelis die while waiting for a life-saving transplant and Yael notes that only about four per cent of Israelis have organ donation cards.

She attributes the low rate both to people's reluctance to contemplate the eventuality of death and misperceptions about Jewish law.

Under Jewish law, there are prohibitions against desecrating a body, delaying burial or benefiting from the body of the deceased.

However, pikuach nefesh – saving a life – overrides these rules. In other words, "post mortem" organ donation to preserve life is considered a mitzvah.

"You have a hierarchy of mitzvahs," said Rabbi Howard Morrison of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, who notes that other mitzvahs, such as keeping Shabbat, can be broken in order to preserve life.

"We are fulfilling our mandate of choosing life."

That belief is shared across denominations – Reform, Conservative and Orthodox rabbis all support post mortem organ donation.

"Rabbis of all movements are in favour of organ transplants," said Rabbi Michael Stroh of Temple Har Zion in Thornhill.

Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto agreed.

"As long as it's going to [help] another human being, organ donation is encouraged," Rabbi Stern said.

"It's a big mitzvah."

However, the rabbis noted that organ donation for the purpose of medical research is not permitted.

"The need to save a life has to be in place," Rabbi Morrison said.

There is also some rabbinic debate about when a person is defined as dead under Jewish law.

The halachic debate offers two main views: a person is either dead when there is irreversible cessation of neurological functions or when there is irreversible cessation of the heartbeat.

Dr. Paul Greig, director of gastronintestinal transplants at Toronto General Hospital and a professor at the University of Toronto, said the heartbeat definition is incorrect.

"A patient can remain alive while their heart is not beating," he said.

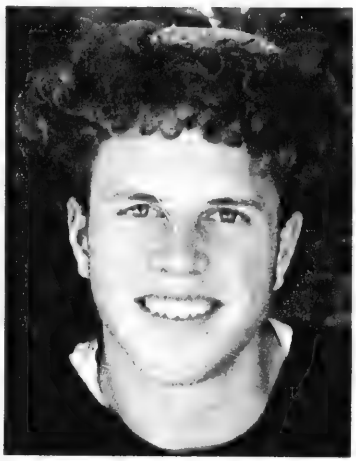
"Surgeons stop the heart, fix it and start it up again… So clearly death cannot be defined as the cessation of a beating heart."

Greig said the legal definition of death in western societies is the "irreversible cessation of brain function," also referred to as "neurological death."

That definition is acceptable to all three rabbis, though, as Rabbi Stroh noted, it's important that death is declared correctly.

"We have to be cautious about moving too fast and turning humans into organ donation factories," he said.

When a person is neurologically dead but still has a beating heart, a respirator can keep oxygen flowing to the organs, which keeps them functioning. It is necessary to have functioning organs in order to perform a successful transplant.



Tani Goodman

Medical advances are making transplants increasingly successful.

"The one year survival rate of most organ [transplants] exceeds 90 per cent. The five-year survival rate after a liver transplant, for example, is 70 to 80 per cent," Greig said.

"There is nothing as rewarding as seeing a patient six months after a transplant, healthy and robust."

Greig said the reluctance to donate organs is also a problem in Ontario, particularly in Toronto, where the rate is the lowest in North America.

He said some people may be leery of doctors being overzealous in deciding if a patient is neurologically dead.

"It's the doctor's raison d'etre to save patients' lives, not provide organs to transplant surgeons," Greig said.

Greig said the best way to become an organ donor is to give consent to your family members, as they have the ultimate say should the situation arise.

You can also sign an organ donor card through the Ministry of Health and Long Term Care and the Trillium Gift of Life Network.

"It's one of the most dramatic things you can do in medicine," Greig said. "It's extraordinary."

Munich massacre remembered in Athens

By JEAN COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ATHENS — Several political and sports dignitaries attended a memorial service held here last week for the 11 Israelis killed at the 1972 Summer Olympics at Munich.

But the widow of one of the Israelis killed by Palestinian terrorists at the Munich Games made the deepest impression during the ceremony at the Israeli ambassador's residence.

In her speech, Ankie Spitzer pressed Dr. Jacques Rogge, the president of the International Olympic Committee, to hold a more public memorial for those killed as part of the Olympic Games.

"Dr. Rogge, you were an Olympian in Munich, you were the brother of the 11 murdered athletes. All of you were part of this great Olympic family," said Spitzer, whose husband, fencing coach Andre Spitzer, was among the 11 killed.

"Then why is it that tonight we are standing here at the Israeli ambassador's residence. We should have this memorial in front of all athletes sponsored by the IOC, because this is not an Israeli issue. This concerns the whole Olympic family."

Rogge did not respond to the request to remember the slain athletes at the Games themselves

Many of the nearly 300 people at the Aug. 19 service gave Spitzer a standing ovation.

After Spitzer spoke, Rogge, who competed in yachting at the 1968, 1972 and 1976 Olympics, took the podium.

He told the audience that he "was one of the 7,000 athletes representing 121 countries in what should have been a festival of sport, of humankind and friendship. But these games were sent into darkness. The fifth of September, 1972, changed the face of the Olympic movement and the Olympic Games forever."

Rogge discussed typical Olympic themes – brotherhood, friendship and the need to keep politics out of the Games – but did not respond to Spitzer's request to remember the slain athletes at the Games themselves.

"I was very disappointed" in Rogge's speech, Spitzer said after the service.

But she admitted that his presence at the ceremony – the first time a sitting president had attended such a ceremony since the Munich Games – "was a step in the right direction."

Rogge was not the only dignitary in attendance. Prince Albert of Monaco, Athens Mayor Dora Bakoyanni, Greece's interior minister, Prokopis Pavlopoulos, and Israeli cabinet minister Limor Livnat, were also there, as was former IOC president Juan Antonio Samaranch.

First to the podium was Tzvi Hashivian, president of the Israel Olympic Committee, who made it clear that terror will never deter Israeli sports.

Said Hashivian: "We swore in Munich that we will continue participating in sport events all over the world and we do so, showing to terror that they did not kill our athletic spirit."

The world was again reminded of the way politics is interwoven into the Olympic Games in Athens, when an Iranian athlete refused to fight his Israeli competitor in judo.

Hashivian was followed by Yakov Arar, the chief rabbi of Greece, who recited Kaddish for the athletes.

On Sept. 5, 1972, the athletes were taken hostage by members of the Palestinian Black September terrorist group. The terrorists killed their hostages during a botched rescue attempt by German police at the Furstenfeldbruck military airport.

Israel's ambassador to Greece, Ram Aviram, was pleased with the ceremony. "The event was marked by the Greek government in a very honourable way. The perception in Greece, along with the other free nations of the world, is that terror must be fought in all of its forms."

For her part, Spitzer vowed to press on.

"When we went to Montreal four years after Munich and asked for a memorial, we were laughed at," she said. "We have suggested the minimum of one minute of silence without even mentioning that they were Israelis or Jews, but nothing happened. Yet we will go on until we succeed."

Iran may get uranium from South Africa

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran and South Africa signed a memorandum of understanding last week on bilateral co-operation. The deal paves the way for the two countries to expand trade ties, and may include South Africa selling uranium to Tehran.

The memorandum was signed by South African Defence Minister Mosiuoa Lekota and his Iranian counterpart, Rear Admiral Ali Shamkhani. This was the first such visit by a South African defence minister to Tehran since the 1979 Islamic revolution.

At Tuesday's signing ceremony, Shamkhani praised South Africa for its position on Iran's nuclear weapons program, which Tehran says is for peaceful purposes. He said that the agreement will lead to the expansion of bilateral cooperation in all areas.

Lekota reportedly said that making peaceful use of nuclear energy is the legitimate right of the Islamic Republic.

Brig.-Gen. Yossi Kuperwasser, head of Israel's military intelligence research department, told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee that Iran is expected to have full nuclear ability by early 2007. Kuperwasser also said that Iran will purchase the technology it needs to enrich uranium by the first half of next year.

Iran said Tuesday it would destroy Israel's Dimona nuclear reactor if the Jewish state were to attack Iran's nuclear facilities. A senior commander warned that Iranian missiles could reach Dimona.

"If Israel fires a missile into the Bushehr nuclear power plant, it has to say goodbye forever to its Dimona nuclear facility, where it produces and stockpiles nuclear weapons," said the deputy chief of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards, Brig.-Gen. Mohammad Baqer Zolqadr, in a statement.

Zolqadr was referring to the site of Iran's first nuclear reactor at Bushehr, a coastal town on the Gulf. Built with Russian assistance, the reactor is due to come on stream in 2005.

Iran says its nuclear program is strictly for the generation of electricity. But Israel and the United States strongly suspect Iran is secretly building nuclear weapons.

Zolqadr did not say how Iran would attack Dimona, but the head of the Revolutionary Guards' political bureau, Yadollah Javani, said Iran would use its Shahab-3 missile.

"All the territory under the control of the Zionist regime, including its nuclear facilities, are within the range of Iran's advanced missiles," Javani said in a separate statement.

Iran announced last week it had successfully test-fired a new version of the Shahab-3, which has a range of 1,296 kilometres. Israel is about 965 kilometres west of Iran.

Israel has developed with the United States the Arrow anti-ballistic missile system. It is said to be capable of intercepting and destroying missiles at high altitudes.

AG: ICJ fence ruling may lead to sanctions against Israel

By YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Attorney General Menachem Mazuz recently warned that the decision on the separation fence by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in The Hague could lead to anti-Israel actions in international forums that could include sanctions.

The warning accompanied a report delivered Thursday by Mazuz to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who requested a month ago that the attorney general set up a committee to look into the ICJ's decision.

In an advisory opinion to the UN General Assembly last month, the ICJ said that Israel's fence is illegal and must be torn down.

"It is difficult to overestimate the negative ramifications that the ICJ's decision will have on the State of Israel in various spheres, even on issues beyond the separation fence," Mazuz wrote in an accompanying note to Sharon.

"The decision could gradually have an effect on rulings by Israeli courts about the administration of military authority in the territories and about the building of the fence."

Mazuz added: "The decision creates a political reality for Israel on the international level that may be used to expedite actions against Israel in international forums, to the point where they may result in sanctions."

Mazuz recommends that, at the earliest possible opportunity, Sharon make changes to bring the separation fence's route and arrangements in the seam-line areas in line with the principles fixed by the Israeli High Court of Justice in its June decision about the fence in the Beit Suriq area (where 30 kilometres of the current route were disqualified). This, Mazuz says, could lessen tensions in the international legal arena.

Mazuz also recommends that the corrected route of the fence be based in a new cabinet decision that would send a message to the world that Israel is upholding international law according to the decisions of its own courts.

The attorney general also recommends setting up an inter-ministerial team to study international developments that affect Israel, as well as a legal team to follow legal processes abroad and make recommendations.

He proposes that Israeli spokespeople stress that Israel upholds international law and accepts the ICJ's opinion, even though it was based on partial, and partly obsolete, data.

Menachem Mazuz

The committee that drew up the 84-page report consisted of legal experts from the Justice Ministry, the defence establishment, the Israel Defence Forces and the Foreign Ministry.

Meanwhile, the High Court of Justice on Thursday gave the state 30 days to explain the implications of the ICJ decision on the separation fence for Israel's policy regarding the fence.

In related developments, the Vatican has been successfully mustering international pressure on Israel to change the route of the separation fence in Jerusalem.

U.S. Senator Rick Santorum, a Republican from Pennsylvania and a Catholic supporter of Israel, recently sent letters to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell on the problems the fence will cause for the region's Christians.

In his letter to Sharon, Santorum stressed he supports Israel's right to build the fence, but is worried by reports that the current route will interfere with Christian holy sites. As an example, he cited the claims by Vatican representatives that the fence will impede religious processions to Jerusalem from the tomb of Lazarus on the Mount of Olives.

Israeli officials said in response that efforts were being made to take Christians' needs into account when building the fence and that discussions are now underway with Christian representatives about creating a gate in the fence near Lazarus' tomb to ensure that processions will not be hindered. However, they added, the fence has not come up in talks with the Vatican.

Meanwhile, the Non-Aligned Movement of developing countries urged all of its members to act "individually or collectively" to impose sanctions both against Israeli settlements and against international companies that participate in settlement activity, including construction of the separation fence.

The 115-member movement, whose foreign ministers met last week in Durban, South Africa, said in its final document that it wanted the UN Security Council to adopt a resolution chastising Israel and to take other measures to force Israel to stop building the 600-kilometre fence, which was declared illegal by the ICJ in July.

"With regard to member states, the ministers called upon them to undertake measures… to prevent any products of illegal Israeli settlements from entering their markets," the statement said. It also called on them "to decline entry to Israeli settlers and to impose sanctions against companies and entities involved in the construction of the wall and other illegal activities in the occupied Palestinian territory."

Diplomats at the UN in New York termed the document "one of the gravest" ever issued against Israel, even though it is strictly declarative and does not bind the movement's members, and said that it demonstrates the negative effect that the ICJ's ruling is liable to have on Israel's diplomatic position.

However, African and South American countries frequently ignore Non-Aligned Movement resolutions adopted under the influence of Arab and Muslim states, and it is considered particularly unlikely that the measures described would be implemented by movement members with which Israel maintains full diplomatic relations.

The non-aligned countries with which Israel maintains close relations are India, Thailand, Colombia, Chile, Peru, Ecuador, Cyprus, Kenya, Angola, Cameroon, South Africa, Seychelles and the Philippines.

Fire guts Jewish community centre in Paris

Authorities immediately suspected the fire was set deliberately. Inside the building, investigators found anti-Semitic graffiti and swastikas scrawled in red marker. One message read, "Without the Jews, the world is happy."

Visiting the site, Rabbi Claude Zaffran said he was "deeply pained and distraught. We're very worried. I have the impression I'm seeing the same movie with the same script. Beyond the declarations and speeches, there must be strong actions to end the string of anti-Semitic acts, he said.

"I am not afraid," Rabbi Zaffran continued, "but as a rabbi with a beard and a hat, I am worried I will be targeted. There are many people and families who are saying that it is impossible to continue like this, that it is no longer possible to send the children out on the Metro or a bus, and that there is no alternative but to go out on foot."

CRIF, the umbrella organization of the Jewish community in France, said in a statement that only hatred of Jews could have been a motive for the incident. Other groups, including the Jewish students' organization, called on the media to begin a public campaign against anti-Semitism, while an anti-Semitism monitoring organization warned that there may be more acts perpetrated against Jews during the coming Jewish holidays.

Serge Benaim, a local Jewish community leader, also expressed frustration.

"It happens over and over again. Every day now, someone lashes out at Jews," he said. "We haven't resolved the problem."

France has suffered a wave of anti-Semitic violence since 2000, coinciding with increasing tensions in the Middle East between Israel and the Palestinians.

Some of the violence has been blamed on young French Muslims, although the Muslim community itself is also a frequent target of racist attacks. France has the largest Jewish and Muslim communities in Europe.

The government has already made an effort to tackle anti-Semitism. In December, it announced a wide-ranging campaign that includes encouraging French schools to lead class trips to Auschwitz, and punishment for anti-Jewish remarks in the media. Extra security at Jewish places of worship and schools and tough sanctions against anyone found guilty of anti-Semitic acts are also part of the policy.

Sunday's fire was discovered by police assigned to patrol outside a nearby synagogue.

Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe and Paris Police Chief Jean-Paul Proust also visited the charred centre, which is on a winding street lined with shops.

Proust noted that the fire could have been deadly. "I have mobilized the best of my police officers," he said. "We will find those responsible. Sooner or later, they will be caught."

The head of the foreign ministry's Diaspora department, Nimrod Barkan, said Sunday that the French government was responsible for the safety of the Jews there. Barkan added that while the French government is showing it is committed and determined to combat the phenomenon, the French judicial system is unaware of the extent of the problem and the courts tend to impose very light penalties on offenders.

> 'Every day now, someone lashes out at Jews'

Sallai Meridor, the chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel was also critical of the French judicial system, saying the system has "to change its attitude toward the anti-Semitic hoodlums" and act forcefully against Anti-semitism.

Meridor commended the French government's statements against anti-Semitism, but said they are not enough. "The French legal system must change its attitude without compromise, and hand down deterring punishments against the perpetrators of these crimes. Without serious deterrent, this phenomenon is liable to continue and even increase," he said.

Meridor also spoke with CRIF president Roger Cukierman after the attack, expressing his shock over the incident and offering the support of the Jewish Agency to the French Jewish community.

Likud rebukes Sharon

The Likud Central Committee last week voted against allowing the opposition Labor Party into a future national unity government, a rebuke to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's bid to expand his coalition in order to push through his planned withdrawal of Israeli troops and settlers from Gaza and parts of the West Bank next year.

Egyptian officials to visit

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit and the head of Egypt's intelligence service, Omar Suliman, will visit Israel and the Palestinian Authority later this month, according to a report published Friday by Egyptian daily Al-Ahram. The Egyptian officials are slated to meet with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to discuss several issues, including Israel's withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank, the paper said.

Israelis help Kenyans

Israeli envoys are helping famine-struck residents of Kenya. Staff at the Israeli Embassy in Nairobi left last week for the southern village of Mingini to distribute food to inhabitants, Israel Radio reported. The embassy is sending 15 tons of food, including rice and beans. In addition, it will distribute 2,310 children's lunches in answer to a call by Kenyan President Mwai Kibaki for all foreign delegations to assist in the region.

Tourism to Israel up

Tourism to Israel was up 58 per cent in the first half of 2004 compared to the same period in 2003. Nearly 822,000 tourists visited Israel in the first six months of the year, according to figures released by Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics and the Tourism Ministry. Some 1.4 million tourists are expected to visit Israel this year.

Soldiers' conduct probed

Israel has probed more than 600 allegations of misconduct by its troops against Palestinians. "Clearly there are legal and ethical guidelines that apply even at times of war," Maj.-Gen. Menachem Finkelstein, Israel's top military prosecutor, said in a Knesset briefing. According to Finkelstein, since the outbreak of fighting with the Palestinians in September 2000, 600 investigations of alleged abuse by soldiers have led to 90 indictments. Of these, 56 soldiers have been convicted and some of them have been jailed.

Birthright budget boosted

Israel's 2005 draft budget includes a $10 million (US) boost for Birthright Israel. The allocation is $1 million higher than government funds put aside last year for the program, despite planned cuts to other areas of the Israeli public sector.

Canadian university students volunteer for Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Ever since 21-year-old Queen's University student Aaron Szamosi came back from his Birthright Israel experience in January, he has longed to return to Israel.

"Coming to Israel for the first time was the most emotional and most incredible experience of my life," says Szamosi, who is from Thornhill.

He is one of 33 university students aged 19 to 28 from across Canada who are currently participating in a two-week volunteer for Israel program, subsidized by the UIAFC (United Israel Appeal Federations Canada) and CIE (Canada Israel Experience).

"When I heard about this trip, I thought it would be an excellent opportunity to see Israel again," Szamosi says, "to meet more Israelis and to build on my desire to help in a way that would be meaningful to the locals here."

For the past week, the volunteers, most of them Birthright Israel alumni from Toronto and Montreal, have helped Israeli students in Kiryat Shmona clean up their school; brought gifts for kids in the "Save a Child's Heart" program at the Wolfson Hospital in Holon; met with victim of terror Steve Averbach at his home; organized a play day for new immigrant children from Ethiopia at Kibbutz Ayelet HaShachar; registered with the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation; given blood at the Magen David Adom capital city headquarters; and packed food parcels for families affected by terrorism at the Terror Victims Support Center in Jerusalem.

"We are really excited that they've come because often we don't have enough helping hands," says Judy Avraham-Chai at the Terror Victims Support Center.

The 2½-year-old nonprofit organization puts together weekly care packages for more than 500 families. Three or four new families join the program each week.

Joelle Ruskin, a 22-year-old student at Montreal's McGill University, says that it's people like Avraham-Chai who have made the volunteer trip meaningful. "I am so moved by what I have seen [on this trip]. The most valuable experience for me has been meeting people who go that extra mile – who adhere to the values that they believe in so strongly and which I think are intrinsically Jewish values.

"The way they appreciate what we do, I don't feel like we deserve it. We haven't done enough. But they have set out ideals for us to try to fulfil when we go back home."

Kate Belzberg, 22, agrees. "The volunteers here have this special part of their souls and their hearts that is so amazing and allows them to reach out to people," the McGill student says. "I have had tears in my eyes so many times because it is so inspiring."

Another McGill student, Yalon Dolev, 25, says that for him the highlight of the trip has been discovering new ways in which to help Israel. "The reason why I joined this group is because when you live in Canada or anywhere outside of Israel, you feel the need to help. But oftentimes you don't know what to do or how to help.

"So far, this trip has been a good way to see how we can help Israel from back home, by mobilizing the Montreal community to reach out to the people of Israel."

According to the trip's CIE leader, 33-year-old Ilana Hirt, it's the best volunteer mission she has ever led. "The best thing for me has been seeing how hard they're working," says Hirt, who notes that although the trip was partially subsidized, each participant paid $1,200 Cdn. "They have taken this so seriously. They are so impassioned by what they are doing, every moment.

"These people really want to give back to the country and volunteer their time. Everything they do, they do with zest and inspiration. It is such a pleasure to see that among young Canadian Jews."

"I have never in my life been given the opportunities that CIE has given me," Belzberg says. She added that group members are currently discussing ways in which to raise money for "Save a Child's Heart."

"The things that I have seen on this trip have been eye-opening, and the volunteer experience has been priceless."

Apples and pomegranates: A Rosh Hashanah seder

By RAHEL MUSLEAH
Special to The CJN

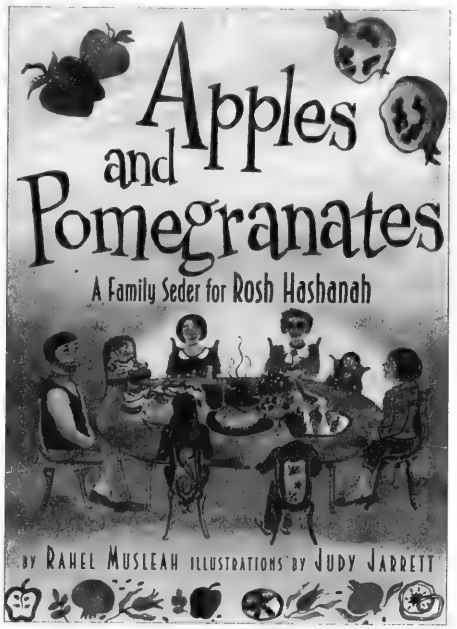
Every holiday has its aura. Pesach has a scrubbed cleanliness, Purim, a cookie-dough indulgence, Sukkot, a back-to-nature thankfulness. Rosh Hashanah has its aura too. For most of us, it's one that begins a season of awe, judgment and repentance.

For me, the start of a new year is a time of blessing and renewal, a different focus than what often feels like a lofty liturgical solemnity. I'm not suggesting party hats and confetti, just a little more optimism and joyfulness. Except for dipping apples in honey and sharing a holiday dinner, home rituals that create memory are largely missing from Rosh Hashanah.

In this respect, families of Sephardi and Mizrachi origin have a secret to share with the rest of the Jewish world. On the first night of Rosh Hashanah, we hold a special ceremony at home during which we recite blessings over a variety of foods that symbolize our wishes for the new year. The ritual is called a seder yehi ratzon (may it be God's will) because we ask God to guide us and provide us with bounty, strength and peace in the year ahead.

The talmudic origins of the seder date back to a discussion by Rabbi Abaye about omens that carry significance (Horayot 12a). He suggested that at the beginning of each new year, people should make a habit of eating the following foods that grow in profusion and therefore symbolize prosperity: pumpkin, a bean-like vegetable called rubia, leeks, beets and dates. Jewish communities throughout the world have adapted this practice, creating seders of their own.

So my shopping list for Rosh Hashanah includes fat, juicy, red-skinned pomegranates; glossy, sticky-sweet dates; apples that will blush spicy pink when they are cooked into preserves with a drop of red food colouring and whole cloves; savory pumpkin; pungent leeks or scallions, foot-long string beans (available in Indian shops) and deep-green spinach.



Often, my parents and my children prepare the foods together. It's an art to separate the jewel-like pomegranate seeds without splattering their scarlet juice all over the kitchen counter; to split the dates, stuff them with walnut halves and arrange them in concentric ovals on a newly polished silver dish.

The foods become vessels for meaning, effective because of their tangibility. "Before Rosh Hashanah, I try to concentrate on the content of day," says my friend Marilyn Greenspan, "but repentance and reflection give way to thinking about what I'm serving for dinner."

The seder makes it not only forgivable but desirable to think about such practicalities.

"The physicality of the seder is what makes it special," says Rabbi Karyn Kedar, author of Dance of the Dolphin: Finding Prayer, Perspective and Meaning in the Stories of Our Lives (Jewish Lights), who has adopted the practice through her Sephardi husband.

We begin the seder itself with a series of biblical verses that carry mystical significance, followed by a declaration that always sends shivers down my spine: Tachel shanah u'virkhotecha! Let the year begin and all its blessings! It's a dramatic moment in its specificity, because this moment and no other ushers in a year that will – so the verse says – unquestionably bring blessings in its wake. I like that positive spirit.

Then come the blessings: First, the dates. "May it be Your will, God, that all enmity will end. May we date this new year with peace and happiness. (The word for end, yitamu, sounds like tamar, the Hebrew word for date.). Second, the pomegranate. May we be as full of mitzvot as the pomegranate is full of seeds. Apples: May it be Your will, God, to renew for us a year as good and sweet as honey. String beans (rubia or lubia): May it be Your will, God, to increase our merits (The word for increase, irbu, resembles the word rubia, bean.). Pumpkin or gourd (k'ra): As we eat this gourd, may it be Your will, God, to guard us. Tear away all evil decrees against us as our merits are called before you (k'ra resembles the words for "tear" and "called"). Spinach or beetroot leaves (selek): May it be Your will, God, to banish all the enemies who might beat us (selek resembles the word for banish, yistalku). Leeks or scallions (karti): May it be Your will, God, to cut off our enemies (karti resembles yikartu, the word for "cut off.")

What does it mean to ask for a good, sweet year? I struggle with the nebulousness of the adjectives. What constitutes sweetness? What shapes goodness? I think it's harmony and wholeness we are asking for – the ability to take the parts of our lives that may satisfy us disparately and put them together so that they create contentment. Through these simple foods, we ask for the ability to appreciate the basic goodness of our lives.

Rabbi Kedar, who lived in Israel for 10 years, recalls that after a terrorist attack, mothers who picked their children up from school let them pick any candy or ice cream they wanted from the corner grocery store. "We wanted to bring sweetness and comfort to their lives in the guise of chocolate," she says. "Blessings, like chocolate, sometimes seem like a luxury."

The seder points to a specific direction for us to achieve sweetness: the blessing of the pomegranate asks that our lives be filled with mitzvot. Some mitzvot – like lighting Shabbat candles and blowing the shofar – are a language of action that mark us as Jews. A second type of mitzvah includes acts of fairness, justice and lovingkindness that we do for each other, from honouring parents to visiting the sick.

"The Jewish new year isn't about losing 10 pounds or quitting smoking," says Kedar. "Nor does 'Shanah tovah' translate as 'Happy New Year.' The word 'tov' – good – is not 'Was the movie good?' 'Yes, it was fun.' It resonates back to Rosh Hashanah as the time God created the world and saw that it was good. Shanah tovah means that we hope the foundations of our lives should have a goodness to them."

Rahel Musleah is the author of Apples and Pomegranates: A Family Seder for Rosh Hashanah. She offers these recipes.

Holiday Food Ideas

Recipes that symbolize New Year's wishes

DATE MUFFINS

3 eggs
½ cup sugar
1 cup chopped nuts
½ cup raisins (soak in water to plump)
1 10-oz. container dates, chopped

Beat eggs and sugar together. Add rest of ingredients. Spoon into mini-muffin holders. Bake at 350 for 15-20 minutes.

FRUIT SALAD WITH POMEGRANATE

Fill a small bowl with pomegranate seeds and place in the centre of a large platter. Arrange seasonal fruit around it and decorate with mint leaves. Here are some suggestions:

pineapple, cored and cut into cubes
nectarines, sliced strawberries, whole or halved raspberries green grapes
blueberries mango, cubed papaya, cubed
kiwi, sliced

GREEN SALAD

lettuce, cleaned and dried (use a mixture of mesclun, romaine, red or green leaf) cucumbers, peeled and sliced green olives

scallions or chives, sliced cherry tomatoes toasted sunflower seeds
chickpeas
boiled red potatoes, quartered

Salad dressing:
1 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. cider vinegar
1 tbsp. tamari (soy) sauce
1 clove fresh garlic, pressed
⅛ tsp. dried ground mustard
⅛ tsp. dill
⅛ tsp. oregano
a squeeze of fresh lemon

Place all salad ingredients in a bowl. In a separate bowl, whisk together all the dressing ingredients. Pour dressing over the salad and toss.

SPINACH SALAD

1 lb. spinach
8 oz. mushrooms, sliced
1 avocado, peeled and sliced
1 3-oz. can mandarin oranges, drained alfalfa sprouts
dried cranberries or fresh pomegranate seeds
roasted cashews

Wash spinach leaves thoroughly to remove any dirt. Pat dry with paper towels. Add mushrooms, avocado, mandarin oranges, and sprouts. Top with dried cranberries and cashews, if desired. Toss with your favourite dressing or use dressing in green salad recipe.

ROASTED LEEKS

8 leeks
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup vegetable or chicken broth
salt and pepper

Cut off the dark green tops of the leeks and discard. Slice light green and white sections. Put the slices in a bowl of water and swish around until the dirt between the layers settles to the bottom. Remove leeks and drain in colander.

Preheat oven to 425. Lightly oil a 9x13-inch baking dish. Brush the leeks with oil and arrange in the dish. Roast for 20 minutes. Add the broth and roast for another 10 minutes. Transfer to a serving dish and sprinkle with salt and pepper to taste.

Judgment at Nuremberg still riveting, 43 years later

Spencer Tracy as Judge Dan Haywood and Marlene Dietrich as Madame Bertholt.

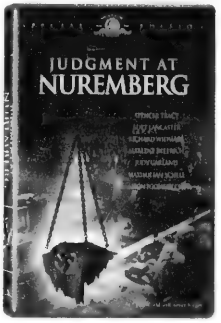
By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Should judges uphold the laws of their country, even if those laws are morally reprehensible?

That's the crux of Stanley Kramer's Oscar-winning 1961 movie Judgment at Nuremberg, which will be released as a special edition DVD by MGM Home Entertainment in September.

Unlike the TV mini-series from a few years back, the script for Judgment at Nuremberg, written by playwright Abby Mann, doesn't focus on the more popular trial of the infamous Nazis such as Goering, Hess and Speer

Instead, this classic is about the 1948 trial of four jurists (two judges, a prosecutor and the former German minister of justice, Ernst Janning).



While there is only a subtle difference on the surface, this script allows the viewer to consider the implications of the judgment. No one can have sympathy for such career Nazis as Hess or Goering, but what about the administrators and civil servants of Nazi Germany? Are they also guilty of war crimes? And by extension, is the entire German nation guilty of crimes against humanity?

By 1948, the continuing war crime trials in Germany were no longer popular, in Germany or abroad. The media didn't report on them and German witnesses almost had to be coerced to give evidence against their countrymen.

As the Cold War began after the Soviet blockade of Berlin, the U.S. government was exerting pressure to end the trials in order not to further alienate the German people against them.

Against this backdrop, Judge Dan Haywood, played by Spencer Tracy, is pressured to make the right decision.

This courtroom drama boasts a stellar cast. Janning is played by Burt Lancaster, who sits silently for most of the film until his climactic outburst at the end. Judy Garland has a short but dramatic scene as Irene Hoffman-Wallner. She tearfully testifies about her 65-year-old Jewish friend Lehmann Feldenstein, who was executed by the Nazis for "racial pollution."

Marlene Dietrich is sultry as always as Madame Bertholt, the wife of an executed German officer, in a role symbolic of the entire German nation, and Montgomery Clift puts on a performance worthy of Tom Hanks' Forrest Gump as the feeble-minded Rudolph Petersen.

But it was the previously unknown actor Maximilian Schell who carries this suspenseful drama from start to finish.

In his Oscar-winning role, Schell plays attorney Hans Rolfe, who has the difficult task of defending the jurists.

Although Tracy and Lancaster both give dramatic speeches, only Schell's vociferous final statement – when he argues that to deliver a guilty verdict on the judges is to pass guilt on the Soviet Union, the Vatican, Churchill and American industrialists – was worthy of the Oscar.

No stranger to courtroom drama, director Kramer (who had just completed Inherit the Wind before tackling Judgment at Nuremberg) does a superb job. He cleverly gets around the language translation issue (the real trial was held in German and English) by having the actors use headphones when they are, theoretically, listening to a foreign language.

Although more than 40 years old, Judgment at Nuremberg, nominated for 11 Academy Awards, is one of those few classic films that truly stands the test of time.

The special features on the DVD release include a conversation between screenwriter Mann and Schell and a tribute to Stanley Kramer.

CORRECTION

In the photo caption that ran with the story, "Ruth Gruber's Haven released on DVD with little fanfare" (CJN, Aug. 19), the actress Illeana Douglas was incorrectly identified. Thanks to a sharp-eyed reader for pointing this out.

Folk-Blues Festival at Distillery: The Toronto City Roots Festival Association presents its first annual Song Celebration, described as "a renaissance of roots, folk, blues, country and city music."

The four-day event features more than 80 musical performers, including Sylvia Tyson, Fred Eaglesmith and Ashley MacIsaac, on four stages. Prices are $25 per concert or $60 for a weekend pass. The festival also offers numerous concerts at $15 each, free daytime programming, buskers, street dancers, a music workshop sponsored by Seneca College and open-stage sign-up opportunities.

Executive director is Howard Gladstone, a Toronto businessman and singer-songwriter who is about to release a second CD, Candles on the River.

The Song Celebration runs from Sept. 3 to 6 in Toronto's historic Distillery District. Tickets available from Ticketmaster (416-870-8000, www.ticketmaster.com) or Sam The Record Man, 347 Yonge St. Visit the festival's website at www.torontocityroots.com.

Passages: Oscar-nominated composer David Raksin died recently in Van Nuys, Calif. He was 92.

Although Raksin arranged music for nearly 170 film and television shows, he is best known for the theme song to Laura, a murder mystery directed by Otto Preminger. He wrote the song in only two days, shortly after his first wife separated from him. Johnny Mercer later wrote lyrics for the song, which was sung by Frank Sinatra, Rosemary Clooney, Ella Fitzgerald and other top performers.

Born in Philadelphia in 1912, Raksin came to Hollywood in the 1930s to help Charlie Chaplin write a film score for his silent classic, Modern Times. He received Academy Award music nominations for Forever Amber (1947) and Separate Tables (1958).

While he was working on Joseph Breen's The Redeemer, a projectionist pointed out to him that everybody on the picture was Catholic except for him. "I' m a relative of the deceased" was his famous reply.

Once asked how he decided on the appropriate style of music for a given film, he replied, "You do what comes supernaturally."

Dancer organizes the workshop she always wanted to attend

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Lauren Collis was tired of going to dance workshops, learning routines and leaving at the end of the day without getting to know the choreographers or performing the dances in a real show.

So Collis, 25, started her own company called Collis Entertainment, and created Take It To Tha Floor, a four-day dance workshop that ends with a "professional high-end show."

The workshop, which takes place Aug. 25 to 28 from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the York Event Theatre, is open to kids of all ages and skill levels.

> 'The response has been overwhelming. Everyone wants to perform'

"Kids come together and put together a show in four days. They're really going to have to work together to make this show work. It's definitely going to be a challenge," she said.

Collis said she has a lot of experience with dance workshops and has attended them "[her] whole life." She also danced with the Toronto Raptors Dance Pak for two years.

Collis is putting the event together with Toronto choreographer Mario Castillo, also known as Jungle.

"Kids work with a professional and put together a professional show," she said.

The workshop will be led by Los Angeles choreographer Dave Scott, who has recently worked on the urban dance movie You Got Served, the U.S. television show Superstar USA on the WB network and is the choreographer for hip hop group B2K.

"He's probably the biggest name out there right now," Collis said. "Every dancer has seen the movie [You Got Served] and knows who he is."

Lauren Collis

Collis has organized autograph sessions and question-and-answer periods for the dancers to meet Scott and other Toronto choreographers who will be at the workshop.

For the past four years, Collis has produced events for Mandell Entertainment, which, along with Roots, is sponsoring the event.

"I told them about the idea and they loved it," she said.

A week before the workshop, Collis already had 60 to 70 dancers signed up from the Toronto area, Montreal and Buffalo.

"I think I'll get a lot more within the next week," she said. "The response has been overwhelming. Everyone wants to perform."

Collis said she would like to continue organizing workshops in the future.

"I'd like to do four big ones a year," she said. "I'd like the shows to get really big."

The Aug. 28 show is open to the public, and tickets can be purchased from the York Event Theatre or by calling Collis at 416-578-9636.

Athens museum records the history of the Jews of Greece

By JACQUELINE SWARTZ
Special to The CJN

ATHENS — Jews have lived in Greece for about 2,400 years, and are one of the oldest Jewish communities in Europe.

Known as Romaniot, they inhabited what is now the Greek mainland and islands, as well as places as far-flung as Alexander the Great's empire. Whether their city was Alexandria or Antioch, their language, customs, food and identity were influenced by Greek culture.

In his book, The Jews of Greece, Nikos Stavroulakis, an Oxford-trained scholar who taught Byzantine history in Israel, writes: "It was within this Greek-speaking, and hence Greek-thinking, world that Jews were forced to re-examine their identity as a people among the nations."

In the 1970s, when the history of Jews of Greece was still largely ignored, Stavroulakis, along with a handful of leaders from the Jewish community, opened a small museum in a back room of an Athens synagogue.

The collection included 19th- and 20th-century clothing, candlesticks, photos, ketubot and objects seized by the German-allied Bulgarians from the Jews of Macedonia and Thrace who were deported in 1943.

After the war, their possessions were returned to Greece.

In 1984, the museum moved to a large apartment in an elegant building, and Jews from Greece, the United States and elsewhere around the world began to donate their heirlooms and artifacts.

In 1997, on its 20th anniversary, the museum moved to a neo-classic building situated between Constitution Square and the old city of the Plaka.

In the light-filled, state of the art museum are displays on how the Jews of various parts of Greece celebrated holidays, what they wore, how they lived and their deep relationship with Greece.

The museum, considered to be among the best Jewish museums in Europe, has a research library, enough storage space for two-thirds of its collection, an art gallery, and a space designed to house periodical exhibits of painting and photography.

On the ground floor is the restored interior of the synagogue of Patras. There are textiles, the wooden Torah cases particular to the Romaniote tradition and an amulet that was intended to protect baby boys against the wiles of Lillith, Adam's first wife.

A few steps up, the first level is devoted to Jewish holidays. On display are menorahs, megillot, a seder tray and the traditional Sephardi sugar sweets for Purim, which was an important holiday. Purim plays sometimes drew an audience of non-Jewish Greeks.

The second level displays evidence of the Jewish presence in Greece through documents, books, photographs and military uniforms. As well, there is a display of the Greek-Jewish contribution to Israel.

Another level displays traditional costumes dating from the mid-18th to the mid-20th century. The striking Spanish-influenced dress of the Salonica Jewish women shows elaborate head-dresses with ribbons, and short jackets with long aprons. The men sometimes wore the Turkish fez. A 1918 photo of a rabbi shows the typical dress of striped caftan and flowing coat.

Traditional costumes dating from the mid-18th to the mid-20th century

On the fourth level, the exhibits show the history of the Shoah. In Nazi-occupied Greece, 87 per cent of the country's 78,000 Jews were sent to their death.

The largest mass murder took place in Salonika where 50,000 Jews lived. The Sephardi Jews of Salonika, the city that was once called the Mother of Israel, had fled persecution from Spain and Portugal and settled in the Ottoman-ruled territory in the 15th century. Their language was Ladino and they constituted the most important Jewish community in the Mediterranean.

When Greece was divided among the Axis powers, Salonika fell under German control.

The 3,000 Jews who lived in Athens were under relatively benign Italian control. They had learned of the Salonika transports, they spoke Greek and were not identifiable.

They also had allies: Greek Archbishop Damaskinos issued a statement ordering priests to hide Jews and tell their congregations to help them. He was the only head of a European church to officially demand that German authorities stop persecuting Greek citizens who were Jews.

The Salonika chief rabbi co-operated with the Nazis, earning the enmity of Salonika survivors, but when the chief rabbi of Athens was ordered to hand over lists to the Gestapo, he was spirited out of Athens with his family by the resistance group EAM, and stayed with them for the rest of the war.

When Greece awoke from the nightmare of Nazi occupation, two-thirds of the Athens Jewish community were alive.

But in all of Greece, only 10,000 Jews remained; more than 8,000 had survived the occupation by hiding or joining the Greek Resistance, and the rest had returned from the camps.

"This is not a Holocaust museum," emphasizes Zanet Battinou, curator of the museum for the last decade. It celebrates the life of the Jews in Greece from BCE on.

Today, 5,000 Jews live in Greece and intermarriage is up to 50 per cent.

Still, the Jewish Museum of Greece continues to be the repository of the history and culture of Greek Jews, including their darkest chapter.

It is the only organization in Greece to teach Holocaust education in the public schools, and its materials are distributed by the Greek Ministry of Education.

Several other ministries have co-sponsored a travelling exhibit, "The Holocaust of the Greek Jews: the Persecuted and the Rescuers," that includes photos and information on the Greek Jews who fought in the national resistance.

After several European stops, the exhibit was scheduled to come to Toronto shortly after Sept.11. The exhibit was cancelled and not rescheduled.

The latest in the museum's series of temporary exhibits is called "Hidden Children in Occupied Greece." On large boards are 16 stories of Jewish children hidden by Christian Greeks during the occupation.

Chosen for being representative of various situations, they are accompanied by photographs, street signs, toys and notebooks. The texts are written simply and starkly because the exhibit is shown to schoolchildren.

The museum's gift shop has an impressive collection of books in English, as well as souvenirs and reproductions. It is on the list of museums of the Greek Ministry of Culture, which provides partial financial support.

Jewish Museum of Greece is at 39 Nikis Street, 10558, Athens, Greece. The website is www.jewishmuseum.gr.

Nobel winning Polish poet dies at 93

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Nobel prize-winning Polish poet Czeslaw Milosz, who died Aug. 14 at age 93, was close to Jews and Jewish causes from an early age and some of his most eloquent and disturbing works dealt with the Holocaust, Holocaust memory and the complex relations between Jews and Catholic Poles.

Milosz grappled powerfully with the physical and intellectual effects of the brutality, oppression and mass destruction that marked the 20th century in Europe.

Though the Poles themselves did not devise or mastermind the Holocaust, Milosz felt the destruction on Polish soil of 3 million Polish Jews in the Holocaust left his native land "sullied, blood-stained, desecrated." Poles, he believed, had to recognize this.

One of his most famous poems, "Campo dei Fiori," written in 1943, described how Poles outside the Warsaw Ghetto were oblivious to the fate of the Jews as the Nazis destroyed the ghetto.

In the poem, he evoked the unforgettable image of a merry-go-round outside the ghetto walls happily spinning as the ghetto itself went up in flames.

This and another Milosz poem about Polish indifference to the destruction of the ghetto sparked one of Poland's first important public debates on the issue of Holocaust guilt and memory, which was carried out in a series of essays and articles in the late 1980s.

In his Nobel acceptance speech in 1980, Milosz described how memory of the Holocaust was fading and becoming distorted, and how the complexities and nuances of history were becoming forgotten.

The Olympics: sports and politics do mix

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The founder of the modern Olympic movement, Baron Pierre de Coubertin, regarded the Olympics as a means of promoting international understanding and peace.

The Olympiads, he hoped, would bring together people from around the world in a spirit of brotherhood transcending nationality, race and religion.

So imagine how shocked and appalled he probably would have been had he witnessed the shredding of his utopian philosophy at the current summer games in Athens.

In a crass spectacle that defied de Coubertin's credo, Arash Miresmaeli, Iran's judo champion, refused to compete against his Israeli opponent, Yudi Vaks.

"This is a general policy of our country to refrain from competing against athletes of the Zionist regime," Iran's Olympic committee explained in a statement shorn of Olympic ideals.

Unfortunately, the Miresmaeili affair was not the first incident of its kind in the annals of the games.

In Jews and the Olympic Games: The Clash Between Sport and Politics (Sussex Academic Press), Paul Taylor makes that abundantly clear.

Far too often, the purity of sportsmanship has been polluted by the distasteful imperatives of politics.

In 1936, Germany, host of the Berlin games, tried to bar Jewish athletes from its team. Thirty-six years later, in 1972, Palestinian terrorists cast a pall on the Munich games by kidnapping and killing Israeli competitors.

And in 1980 and again in 1984, the Olympics were marred by political boycotts spearheaded by the United States and the Soviet Union.

As Taylor suggests in this readable and comprehensive book, which is also a compendium of illustrious Jewish athletes of the 20th century, the most egregious example of politics intruding into sports occurred at the 1936 games.

Soon after the Nazis seized power and began promulgating anti-Semitic laws, they banned Jews from sports clubs throughout Germany.

The ban violated the Olympic charter, which states that participation in sports is a universal human right.

The International Olympic Committee warned Hitler that Germany would lose the games unless it changed its policy. In the face of this pressure, Taylor writes, the Nazis invited Helene Mayer, a celebrated half-Jewish German fencer and an Olympic medalist, to become a member of Germany's squad.

For the Nazis, Mayer was the perfect Jew. Tall and blond, she was the epitome of the Nazi Aryan ideal. And her membership on the team would deflect allegations of Nazi racism.

Mayer's greatest rivals in Berlin were Ilona Elek of Hungary and Ellen Preis of Austria, both of whom were also half-Jewish.

Elek won the gold medal, with Mayer and Preis winning the silver and the bronze. Strangely enough, Mayer gave an enthusiastic Heil Hitler salute when the silver medal was placed around her neck. Taylor's explanation for Mayer's odd behaviour is that she had an idealized picture of Germany.

The Nazis, however, kept another Jewish athlete, the high jumper Gretel Bergmann, off their team. Germany invited her to its Olympic training camp, but her performances there, though good, were judged inadequate.

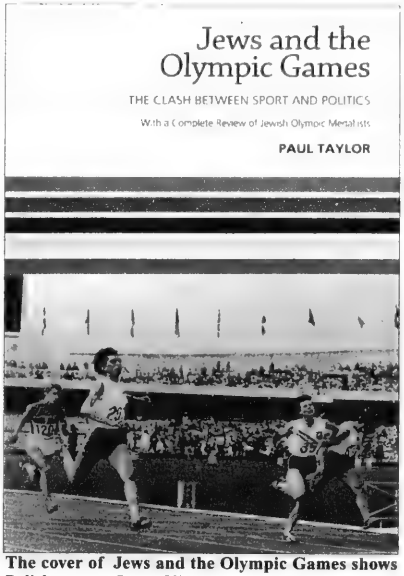
There is reason to believe that she was rejected strictly on racial grounds. After immigrating to the United States in 1937, Bergmann twice won the U.S. high jump championship. In 1980, she was elected to the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame. Ironically, the gold medal in her event was taken by a Hungarian Jew, Ibolya Csak.

Although the 1936 games were tainted by anti-Semitism, Jewish athletes appeared in droves and performed remarkably well. According to Taylor, Jews won 16 medals, 10 of which were gold.

Among the medalists were the Austrian weight-lifter Robert Fein, the Hungarian soccer goalkeeper Gyorgy Brody, the Canadian basketball player Irving Maretsky and the Belgian water polo player Gerard Blitz.

As Taylor suggests, the racism that pervaded the Berlin games had a direct bearing on the selection of the American 4x100 metres relay team.

Two Jewish sprinters, Sam Stoller and Marty Glickman, who already had been chosen were yanked off at the last minute. Years later, an embittered Glickman blamed his exclusion on Avery Brundage, the president of the American Olympic Committee. Brundage, he claimed, removed him and Stoller because he did not want to offend Nazi sensibilities.



Jews and the Olympic Games
THE CLASH BETWEEN SPORT AND POLITICS
With a Complete Review of Jewish Olympic Medalists
PAUL TAYLOR

The cover of Jews and the Olympic Games shows Polish runner Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinska at the 1968 Olympics in Mexico.

In Taylor's estimation, Brundage was favourably disposed toward Nazi Germany. With the outbreak of World War II, he sided with Germany and its allies and objected to President Franklin Roosevelt's commitment to Britain. Later, he blamed Jewish-owned newspapers and movie studios for turning the United States against Germany.

Tragically, a number of Jewish Olympians were murdered during the Holocaust, including Karoly Karpati, an internationally renowned Hungarian wrestler; Attila Petschauer, a Hungarian fencer; Ilja Szrajbman, the Polish national 200-metres freestyle swimming champion, and Lilly Henoch, a German shot-putter and discus thrower.

Two of the most distinguished Jewish athletes who perished in the Holocaust were the gymnasts Alfred and Gustav Flatow, cousins who represented Germany in the first modern Olympiad and who won five gold medals between them. Preis, the Austrian fencer, went into hiding after Germany annexed Austria in 1938, and there she remained for the duration of the war.

The 1972 Munich massacre of 11 Israeli athletes was particularly terrible because it took place on German soil. In an ironic twist, the commander of the Black September group that perpetrated the slaughter was Luttif "Issa" Afif, whose mother was Jewish.

Taylor says the Germans lacked the experience or the resources to deal with the crisis. Out of national pride, they rejected an Israeli offer to send 40 specially trained commandos – led by Ehud Barak, a future prime minister of Israel – to Munich.

Jewish athletes, from the ice hockey player Vitaliy Davidov to the yachtsman Valentyn Mankin, were often found on Soviet Olympic teams.

But in a climate of state anti-Semitism, which took hold in the early 1950s under Joseph Stalin, some Jewish athletes had no alternative but to distance themselves from their Jewish identity.

Throughout the course of Jews and the Olympic Games, Taylor sketches interesting pen portraits of great Jewish athletes.

Two of his subjects are the American swimmer Mark Spitz, who won a record-breaking seven gold medals at the 1972 games, and the Polish sprinter Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinska, who won several gold medals.

The appendix carries brief biographies of Jewish Olympic medalists, from British sprinter Harold Abrams (the only Jew to win the 100-metre race) to Israeli judo star Yael Arad (the first Israeli to win a medal for Israel at the Olympics).

In short, Jews and the Olympic Games is a timely book.

Card set celebrates Jews in major league baseball

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Martin Abramowitz was desperate to have a complete set of baseball cards featuring every Jew who ever made it to the big leagues. When he discovered that 41 of those players never had a card, he went about creating his own set.

His 143-card collection will be among the items on display this weekend, Aug. 29 and 30, at the Baseball Hall of Fame Museum in Cooperstown, N.Y., as the shrine hosts "A celebration of Jews in baseball" in conjunction with the 350th anniversary of Jews in America. The first-ever kosher dinner in the hall's history will be served on Sunday evening.

Since 1982, Abramowitz, in his day job, has been vice-president of planning at Combined Jewish Philanthropies in Boston after working briefly in Montreal and Jerusalem in communal professional leadership positions.

He said his five-year project of collecting photos of every Jewish major leaguer since 1871 allowed him to give a touch of immortality to players who might have otherwise been forgotten.

"I feel really good that I did justice to the memory of those players," he said in a phone interview from his home in Newton, Mass. "The response has been very rich. They're just delighted. It strikes a chord with a lot of people."

Abramowitz said he was sitting around the kitchen table five years ago lamenting the fact he could never complete his set when his son Jacob suggested he get to work. Jacob came up with the logo, sketching a baseball inside the six-pointed Star of David. It appears on each card.

The biggest challenge was tracking down images of the 41 missing players. Abramowitz had no luck trying to obtain them through the Hall of Fame or The Sporting News, since in baseball's early days, cards weren't printed for players who weren't stars.

He found 29 photos at the home of legendary Chicago photographer George Brace, who had just what Abramowitz was seeking in the laundry room of his north side bungalow. Brace had snapped pictures of every player who came through Wrigley Field and Comiskey Park between 1929 and 1993, storing the photos in metal filing cabinets in his basement.

To obtain the final 12 pictures, Abramowitz read obituaries and tracked down family members who had photos. The American Jewish Historical Society (AJHS) also helped him.

"I was basically writing home equity loan checks to pay the designer I hired," said Abramowitz, who was prepared to spend $20,000 to $25,000 (all figures US) to print 1,000 sets and give them away.

When it came time to produce the cards, Jacob helped out again by being in the right place at the right time. The boy in the bunk next to him at Camp Ramah was the son of Fleer Trading Card CEO Roger Grass. A meeting was set up for parents' weekend.

Grass helped obtain clearance from Major League Baseball and its players' association to produce a limited edition of 15,000 commemorative boxed sets.

"They saw this as a unique effort and waived their licensing fees," said a grateful Abramowitz. "I don't think we could have done this if they saw it as a commercial arrangement. The standard practice is to charge fees for the use of images of players in uniforms."

The set, "American Jews in America's Game," is only available through the American Jewish Historical Society (www.ajhs.org) and Abramowitz's not-for-profit organization (www.jewishmajorleaguers.org). AJHS can be reached at 1-866-740-8013.

The set sells for $105 and contains career-leader and check-list cards, as well as essays on the making of the set and the American Jewish baseball experience.

Missing from the set are two active players who have come up since the 2003 All-Star Game, Boston third baseman Kevin Youkilis and Pittsburgh reliever John Grabow.

As well, the son of Lefty Weinert, a pitcher for Philadelphia in the 1920s, attested to his father's Judaism recently, but it was too late for him to be included in the set.

In her biography of Fanny (Bobbie) Rosenfeld, Anne Dublin wonders why Rosenfeld, an extraordinary Canadian athlete, never became a household name.

Bobbie Rosenfeld was on the track and field team that won three medals – two gold, a silver and a bronze – for Canada at the 1928 Olympics in Amersterdam.

Rosenfeld and her teammates – the Matchless Six – were the first women to compete in track and field at the Olympics.

In 1950, she was selected by sportswriters and broadcasters across Canada, as Canada's woman athlete for the half-century.

"Despite all the obstacles she faced as a woman, she became one of the finest athletes Canada has ever produced," writes Anne Dublin, a Toronto teacher-librarian, in Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything (Second Story Press).

The book takes readers on a journey through Rosenfeld's life. It is written clearly and is an easy summer read. Recommended for children ages nine and up, it is perfect for school projects and includes explanations of difficult and challenging words.

Bobbie Rosenfeld

Rosenfeld, who was born in 1904 in Katrinaslov, Russia, and grew up in Barrie, Ont., had an "extraordinary sense of fair play," and was an all-around athlete who was quick to learn new sports, Dublin writes. Along with participating in track and field, she played hockey, basketball, softball and tennis.

Rosenfeld became a sports columnist after she was diagnosed with arthritis in 1929, abruptly ending her days as an Olympic athlete. She died in 1969.

The book includes black and white photographs, quotations from Rosenfeld, newspaper clippings and interesting facts. Dublin also writes about some of the events that occurred in Canada and the world during Rosenfeld's time, which give context to the story of her life.

Rosenfeld, with her persistence in challenging women's roles and her ability to break records, is also featured in Lorne Zeiler's Hearts of Gold (Raincoast Books), a book of stories about the courage, dedication and triumphs of Canadian Olympians.

A Toronto writer, Zeiler profiles more than 20 outstanding Canadian athletes, including recent and well-known athletes such as figure skaters Jamie Salé, David Pelletier and Elvis Stojko, as well as cross-country skier Beckie Scott. Zeiler also includes earlier and less-known athletes, among them Percy Williams, who was on the men's track and field team at the 1928 Olympics in Amsterdam; Arnold Boldt, who was on the track and field team at the 1976 International Olympiad for the Physically Disabled in Toronto; and Irene MacDonald, a diver who won a bronze medal at the 1956 Olympics in Melbourne.

Zeiler was inspired to write Hearts of Gold after watching Egerton Marcus' silver-medal boxing win, with a broken right hand, during the 1988 Olympics in Seoul and after witnessing his older brother, Ari, battle a serious illness.

Ari "had fallen ill a number of times during the summer," and there wasn't a lot to watch on TV while he was lying in a hospital bed, Zeiler said in an interview. "I remember us watching the Olympic Games."

When he was selecting athletes for Hearts of Gold, Zeiler looked for innovators and athletes who "persevered through major adversity," he said, whether it be technical, physical, emotional or political, and he looked for those who "held close to their values."

Zeiler said that he also wanted to include athletes who were "fairly representative of the country in terms of ethnicity and geography."

Three of Zeiler's favourite athletes in the book are Sammy Luftspring, a Jewish boxer who refused to fight in the 1936 Olympics in Berlin as a protest against Hitler's Nazi regime; rower Silken Laumann, who suffered a severe leg injury weeks before the 1992 Olympics in Barcelona but went on to capture a bronze medal; and Rosenfeld, who, Zeiler said, was "such a fantastic all-around athlete and someone who doesn't get enough mention."

Zeiler said that Hearts of Gold is for "sports fans and people who are interested in inspirational stories" and is targeted to "anyone from age eight to 80.

"I hope a lot of women read the book, as well. A lot of our [Olympic] success comes from females, [such as triathlete] Sharon Donnelly, Silken Laumann, Beckie Scott, [synchronized swimmer] Sylvie Fréchette, Bobbie Rosenfeld... There are pretty incredible female athletes in this country."

Judoka Arik Ze'evi earns Israel its first medal at Games

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ATHENS — Israeli judoka Arik Ze'evi won Israel's first Olympic medal of the Athens Games last Thursday, defeating Dutch opponent Elco Van Der Geest for the bronze in the men's 100-kilogram judo competition.

Meanwhile, Israeli swimmer Anna Gostomelsky failed to qualify for the semifinals in the 50-metre freestyle competition the next day, finishing in 35th place at 26.72. Marksman Guy Starik also failed to make the final of his event – the men's 50m rifle prone event. Starik ended the qualifying round in 16th place, with an average of 9.867.

Ze'evi said after his match that he had been under "tremendous stress" all week. "It was the hardest day of my life," he said. "In light of the people who made it to the finals, it is a true accomplishment. I am very pleased with the bronze."

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called Ze'evi to congratulate him on his victory and said: "You were under a lot of pressure and you stood fast as a true warrior, you have brought great joy to the entire nation of Israel."

President Moshe Katsav also called Ze'evi to congratulate him.

His medal is Israel's fifth in Olympic history. Judoka Yael Arad won a silver medal in Barcelona in 1992, and judoka Oren Smadja earned a bronze in the same games. Windsurfer Gal Friedman won a bronze in Atlanta in 1996, and kayakist Michael Kolganov won bronze in Sydney in 2000.

Ze'evi lost his chance to win gold when he was defeated by Jang Sung Ho of South Korea in his third bout.

The loss led Ze'evi to the repechage group, where he defeated Franck Martial Moussima from Cameroon in the semi-final and French opponent Chislain Lemaire in the final of the group.

Ze'evi was leading against Ho in the third round and managed to score more points than his opponent, but he was thrown onto his shoulders in a move called an ippon, which won his Korean opponent the fight.

The defending European champion and No. 2 in the world, Ze'evi beat world No. 3 Mario Sabino of Brazil in his first bout. He went on to defeat Italian Michele Monti, who in turn defeated the Sydney 2000 silver medallist, Nicolas Gill of Canada.

Arik Ze'evi in a pre-Olympic practice session.

Also on Thursday, an unofficial memorial service was held in Athens for the 11 Israeli athletes killed by Palestinian terrorists at the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich.

The ceremony took place at the residence of the Israeli ambassador and was attended by the president of the International Olympic Committee, Jacques Rogge.

Meanwhile, the world judo's governing body said Thursday that Iran won't face sanctions over the failure of its judo world champion to fight Israeli Udi Vaks earlier in the Games.

Despite earlier statements by Iranian officials that Arash Miresmaeili was told not to fight Vaks last week because of Tehran's political boycott of Israel, the International Judo Federation (IJF) accepted after an inquiry that Miresmaeili had a genuine medical reason for showing up too heavy to fight.

"The commission concluded that since Mr. Miresmaeili stated that he had no pre-planned intention for not competing in the under 66-kilogram category and that he had made no statement of any sort to any press, the only point that remained was that Mr. Miresmaeili was overweight on the weigh-in day," the IJF said in a statement.

"As the IJF has no rule for penalizing overweight athletes, the IJF executive committee decided not to take any sanction against Arash Miresmaeili."

The double world champion weighed in for the bout more than 5 kilograms over the 66-kilogram limit, a huge margin at the top level of the sport. An Iranian Olympic official told Reuters at the time that his failure to fight was due to the Islamic republic's boycott of Israel and that it was not Miresmaeili's decision.

Maccabi Canada to host summer fun days

Maccabi Canada is inviting its supporters to two days of sports fun.

On Sunday, Aug. 29, Robin Hood Camp in Markham will host a family picnic that features softball competition on its entertainment schedule.

Tryouts for the women's softball team that will compete next July in Israel at the Maccabiah Games will be the feature attraction. Picnickers can also feast on a three-pitch softball tournament involving the men's 1985 and '89 Maccabiah teams, the 2005 team and two squads from the B'nai Brith's softball league.

On Monday, Aug. 30, Maccabi Canada will hold its annual golf tournament at Lionhead Golf and Country Club in Brampton. The full-day event will include breakfast, lunch and dinner, a round of golf, and evening festivities hosted by Jim Ralph, voice of the Leafs. Argonaut head coach Mike "Pinball" Clemons, Detroit Pistons assistant coach Herb Brown and rock musician Larry Gowan are among the celebrities expected to attend. Cost of the event is $375 per person.

For more information about either event, contact Debbie at 416-398-0515.

Maccabi TA stuns PAOK in Champions League play

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Maccabi Tel Aviv took a major step to a first-ever appearance in the group stage of soccer's Champions League when it stunned PAOK Thessaloniki 2-1 in Greece recently, leaving the Greeks a formidable task for the return leg in Tel Aviv.

Coach Nir Klinger opened with a defensive line up, leaving Eli Biton, Baruch Dago and Reuven Oved on the bench, but after soaking up some early pressure, it was Maccabi that went ahead at the 13-minute mark.

Ghanian-born striker Ishmael Addo found himself clear against the Greek goalkeeper after Erez Mesika cut through the PAOK defence with a long pass, and from close range, Addo rolled the ball into the net to give Maccabi a precious away goal, sending the crowd of 28,000 into shock.

PAOK poured forward in search of an equalizer, but Maccabi keeper Liran Strauber was outstanding, stopping several close shots on goal. A moment before halftime, Maccabi doubled its lead when Erez Mesika sent a curling shot from the left side of the box past the outstretched fingertips of the PAOK keeper.

Maccabi retreated into defence in the second half, and at the 50-minute mark let in a goal from Cypriot striker Yiasoumis Yiasoumi after Salim Abu Siam fumbled a clearing chance. PAOK attacked desperately for the remainder of the game, but failed to get past Strauber as Maccabi hung on for victory.

After the game, Klinger cautioned fans and players not to get too excited, saying Maccabi had been in situations before where it had uncorked the champagne prematurely.

A great escape on Centre Island

A few months ago, I started volunteering at Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee. Ve'ahavta's goal is tikkun olam and it actively engages in efforts to repair the world's inequities. Ve'ahavta educates others and raises consciousness while helping Jews and non-Jews with humanitarian assistance and relief. I have never encountered a group of people so passionate about making the world a better place. I quickly became friends with the staff and I devote as much time as possible to helping them.

By MIRIAM PORTER

For instance, I have participated in "the sandwich challenge." Every Tuesday, volunteers make 300 cheese sandwiches that are distributed to Toronto's homeless. I have also had the life-changing experience of riding on Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless. This colourful van, with the slogan "Repairing the World" on the back and a heart in a Torah on its side, leaves Ve'ahavta's office at 6 a.m. each Wednesday and Thursday to travel through Toronto's alleys, ravines and parks with coffee, sandwiches, clothing and supplies for those in need.

But it offers much more than supplies. Staff and volunteers also provide conversation and emotional support, letting clients know they are not alone and help is available.

Being part of something so unique and beautiful has made me a better person. I strongly encourage others to participate.

On Aug. 13, Ve'ahavta organized its second annual Great Escape Island Adventure, which was started last year as a substance-free day to remind people how joyous and wonderful life can be. Last year, this day of fun, escape and inspiration encouraged two people to come in off the street.

This year, I was honoured to be one of 26 volunteers to accompany 80 clients – ranging from teenagers to people in their late 60s – and one very excited black dog with a red bandanna on the ferry to Centre Island.

A delicious lunch buffet was set up under a large pavilion with a variety of pasta salads, coleslaw, bagels, gourmet cheese spreads, fruit, chips, muffins and even homemade banana bread baked by a volunteer. I ate lunch with some new friends and came to realize that Ve'ahavta's team is not only filling stomachs, they're also nourishing souls. Food will give you energy and keep you alive, but having a reason to live might be just as important.

After lunch, we visited the various stations set up under the pavilion.

One woman gave oatmeal and cucumber-slice facials at one end, while a man offered professional massages at the other. Another woman gave manicures to anyone who wanted one.

We may take such services for granted, but for some they are huge luxuries.

There was also a reading station with books and magazines, as well as a watermelon-eating contest and an art corner where people could draw or paint.

The highlight was a talent show in which clients sang, played guitar, danced and laughed.

Near the end of the day, a man I know who lives on the street came up to me and said, "I've been waiting for this day for a long time. Thank you so much."

Then his friend added, "This is the best time I've had all summer."

The Great Escape Island Adventure was a huge success.

If you want learn more about Ve'ahavta and its international programs, or if you want to volunteer or donate, visit the website at www.veahavta.org.

And the next time you see someone living on the street, take some time to feed their souls through conversation.

I think you will find we are not that different.

Epi on Education

Factors for success in teaching

Seymour Epstein

I recently attended a master class at the International Opera Workshop in Tel Aviv and found the evening to be of special interest to me as both an educator and a trainer of teachers.

The class I attended in mid-July was of the highest quality, both in content and in form. Joan Dornemann, the chief vocal coach of the Metropolitan Opera in New York, worked with five young Israeli opera singers in front of an appreciative audience.

What struck me, even more than the beauty of the five young voices, was the quality of the educational moment. In trying to analyze what was special about the teaching, I identified five factors, which, as obvious as they are, are often neglected.

• Joan Dornemann has complete mastery of the operatic repertoire. She is totally at home in every major work and can easily teach the language, poetry, music, and nuance of every aria that was demonstrated.

• She showed great respect to the students. It's not easy to point out an error in front of an audience, but it can be done effectively and with compassion if the starting premise is one of empathy and respect. More than that, she demonstrated concern for the total person, not just the opera singer on stage.

• Dornemann obviously loves opera, and that came through in every word and gesture she made. She successfully transmitted that love (and its demands) to the students and the audience.

• She is a teacher's teacher, a master pedagogue. Her instructive skills were evident in every interaction with the singers.

• The young singers were highly motivated to master the operatic domain. One could sense that singing the aria with comprehensive perfection was the single-minded goal of their profound concentration.

Content mastery, respect for learners, love of the subject, pedagogic competence and high motivation – these are factors for success in the art of teaching, be it opera or Torah.

Shabbos with Aunt

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Sylvia Fine is my father's sister. I call her "Aunt."

Since Ben – Aunt's husband – died, she and I have spent Shabbos dinners together at her Bathurst Street condominium, making Kiddush on grape juice and eating the finest foods prepared by my mother and sisters.

URBAN WRITER

Over the years, Aunt and I have become splendid friends. It took her a while to figure out why I'm not frum, but then an ageless respect grew between us. Aunt is not Orthodox herself, and we eventually established an exclusive wink between us, knowing that the proverbial car was parked outside the shul on Shabbos.

It's kind of like when only two members of a family are Orthodox and nobody quite "gets" them, but in our case it's the other way around.

Aunt and I have shared some very exciting adventures. John Vince, a bulk-foods store and grocery, is a place where our childlike spirit erupts. We stroll the aisles casually, shmoozing, joking and searching for Aunt's oatmeal in the package, and Coke for 99 cents, if we can get it at that price. If we can't, we grudgingly settle for the imitation.

Sometimes – well, actually, quite often – one of us will clandestinely reach into a candy bin, scoop up a cherry-filled chocolate and heedfully pop it into our mouth. She is my lookout, and I keep a vigilant eye out for her. The last thing the family needs is a scandal.

On most Saturdays, around 3:30 in the afternoon, Aunt and I drive to a bagel joint. I order blintzes and she orders a decaf so as not to be filled up for her dinner at 5 p.m. The bill is around $8.50 and she always takes it.

The round table in the corner of the restaurant is where I learned about Aunt's life. I discovered she was born in the house where Baycrest Centre would later stand. I listened to her memories of her mother, who died when Aunt was two, and her exceptional love for her friends and family, especially her three brothers, Berrel, Phyvle and Davey and her cousin Dorothy.

Aunt's shtetl-like accounts of the "Bobbe" (her grandmother) are permeated with personality, including the one about how this feisty Polish woman jumped high fences to get her grandchildren into Pontypool (a vacation spot near Peterborough), and how another time she plunged through the roof of a Sukkah at the wedding of the very auspicious Rav Isaac'le.

Regardless of the insensitivity of age, Aunt's comedic timing is still impeccable. As she eases into the van she bought me, I ask her how she slept, as I have every week for the past six years. Her answer is always the same: "Like a baby." Then she stops, hesitates a bit more, and adds, "I cried all night." She gets me every time.

Aunt suffers terrible loneliness for Ben. Her most radiant reminiscence is reserved for her memories of her beloved husband. Ben drove Sylvia everywhere, and he took her wise counsel to buy a nuts and bolts factory. The two doted on one another amorously and were the apple of each other's eyes. She believes she will see Ben again.

Aunt has dazzling hazel eyes, a nose with uneven character and thick Rosensweig lips. She is a looker, and makes men melt when she flashes her heavenly smile.

I wish her good health and the awareness that she is a blessing to all who know her. I am grateful for our wonderful Shabbos dinners. She is my Shabbos Queen.

The only thing is, she could have held off on the fattening desserts, because she knows I'm trying to get back to my original weight – seven pounds, eight ounces.

Jewish Community Focus

Editorial

Picture the Jewish community of a large city. The Conservative, Reform and Orthodox have little contact with each other. The main Anglo-Jewish newspaper is considered too left-wing by the right and too right-wing by the left. All synagogues and Jewish institutions are preoccupied with security. Day schools are divided between religious and philosophical ideologies.

Sound familiar? Just like Toronto? Well, it's not. I'm describing the Jewish community in London, England. People have depicted Ottawa, Los Angeles and Cleveland the same way. I suspect that any large Jewish community has the same characteristics.

There is a pattern here, a pattern of disunity and disharmony. Why is this so?

One explanation is simply an echo of the story of the Jewish man who is stranded on a desert island for 30 years. When he is rescued, it is discovered that he has built two shuls – one he davens in, the other he wouldn't set foot in if his life depended on it.

While the tale is supposed to be a joke, it is really very sad. For how many of us is Judaism a negative thing? I keep kosher to distinguish me from all those who don't. My children go to day school to prove that I am truly committed, unlike those down the block who send their kids to public school. I give my daughter a lavish bat mitzvah party to show that we are more progressive than those who don't.

I am not suggesting by any means that there are not many people in all streams of Judaism who follow the customs they do out of genuine conviction. What I am wondering is whether there is entirely too much of an "us versus them" mentality in the Jewish world.

Witness the recent and ongoing kerfuffle about the wigs that many Orthodox women wear. When it was discovered that wigs made from Indian hair came from hair dedicated to various gods, there was great consternation in that community, as it is forbidden to get any benefit whatsoever from avodah zarah (idol worship).

Some burned their wigs at a considerable financial sacrifice in view of their cost. Others put them aside until a final decision is made. What was the reaction in both the observant and non-observant communities? Is burning the wigs an act of hysteria and fanaticism? Is not burning them a sign of not taking the issue seriously enough? Is the wearing of wigs altogether a regressive, offensive symbol of subservience? Maybe the whole situation is a tempest in a cholent pot.

This supplement has always tried to concentrate on the things that make us a community, rather than those that have the potential to break it apart. The 2004 edition is no exception.

Articles discuss new developments at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Mount Sinai Hospital, both longtime sources of great pride for the Toronto Jewish community. Individual members of the community offer foster care, day care and special needs education, the remuneration not nearly equal to the effort and commitment that goes along with these endeavours.

Similarly, the very young and the more mature both get recognition for their many accomplishments.

We also have a heartwarming story about the Jewish community of faraway Hong Kong. When young Aaron Zweig became seriously ill, all segments of that community came together to offer physical, emotional, financial and spiritual support to Aaron and his family. This is a true example of the ideal of Kol Yisrael areivim zeh bazeh – all the people of Israel are responsible one for the other.

In the end, that is the true glory of our people, that in spite of all the disagreements and squabbles and divisions, when push comes to shove, we are there for each other. Maybe someday we will realize it.

Agency seeks foster families in the Jewish community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Linda Shapiro, foster care recruiter for Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), says her mission is to make foster care part of every-day life for Jewish people.

"I would like to see foster parenting become part of the things that Jews do. [For example,] Jews should keep kosher, give tzedakah and take in foster children."

Shapiro, who co-ordinates the agency's One Shul, Two Homes program introduced last year in order to try to find two new foster homes in every congregation in the Greater Toronto Area, says she will talk about foster care to anyone who is willing to listen.

"I am passionate about the importance of foster care. Foster parents can contribute greatly to the lives of Jewish children of all ages."

She has spent much of the past year speaking to synagogue groups and parlour meetings, urging rabbis to talk about foster care, providing brochures and other materials to synagogues, and arranging to have shuls write in their bulletins and newsletters about the desperate need for foster parents.

"It's going well. We are getting calls, but we are always looking for more parents.

"When we talk about foster children, many people think we can't be talking about Jewish children. Our task is to let them know that the problem is very real."

Avraham Friedman, supervisor of the agency's foster care program, says the reality is that Jewish families are affected by the same social problems as all other families.

Children are in care for many different reasons

"There are underlying precipitating factors, such as poverty, mental illness, marital conflict and inadequate parenting skills that affect parents' ability to raise their children.

"Jewish children of all ages desperately need Jewish foster homes. In our grandparents' generation this statement would be shocking, impossible to believe. In our generation, it is a stark reality."

Over the past 20 years, Friedman and his wife have fostered 10 children and adopted a child with special needs.

Those in need of care include victims of abuse or neglect, children with physical or developmental challenges, children whose parents are unable to care for them, and troubled teens in need of alternative living arrangements when they cannot live at home.

As JF&CS is a licensed children's aid society overseen by the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services, Friedman says, it is mandated to protect children and if necessary, bring them into care.

"We may find ourselves in an emergency situation such as receiving a call from a parent who says a child is impossible to handle. We do have a department to help parents, but if it is an issue of safety we have to provide it.

"We have children in care from newborn to age 21. At age 16, a child has the legal right to leave the foster home. If a child does not want to remain in the care of JF&CS, the matter can be brought back to the court for a hearing and a decision."

A child can remain in foster care until age 18, Friedman says, at which time he terminates his status of being a child in care. If the child is still attending school, the agency can continue to provide support in a more independent living arrangement until age 21, when he formally graduates from being a child in care.

There have been situations in which a former child in care over the age of 21 and his foster parents agree that the child should remain in the foster home in a room and board arrangement, Friedman says.

Children may come into care on a planned or emergency basis for a short or a long term. If at all possible, the goal of JF&CS is to reunite the child with his or her parents, and no more than 30 per cent stay longer than five years, he says.

"If a child is going to be adopted, it is likely it will be in the initial years of care, so we get them into a consistent home as soon as we can.

"Our challenge is to provide continuity for our kids. They face tremendous challenges, and they live with the label of living in foster care."

Separation is often a big issue for them, he says, "and unless it is dealt with properly it can have an effect on future relationships.

Regular meetings between JF&CS and foster families

"If a child has the benefit of living in one foster home, he will experience consistent love and nurturing. Compare that to a child who has experienced multiple moves."

The agency has a resource bank of families, Friedman says, "and from that list, we try to select a family whose level of observance is similar to the child's level of observance. This helps minimize the child's trauma."

He concedes that fostering is not for everyone. "We are looking for families that understand kids. They need to know what it means for a child to be ripped from his family."

Selma Elzas, foster care co-ordinator at JF&CS, says that once a child is in care, he has his own social worker. As well, the child's biological parents have their own social worker who helps them plan for their child's return home.

"As part of our ongoing care, we meet regularly with foster parents. We set up a plan of care which identifies goals and we review it every 90 days."

In addition, she says, "we must ensure that all our foster homes meet certain safety standards and that all foster parents are Jewish. As well, all our foster parents must take training provided by the agency to enable them to acquire the necessary knowledge and skills.

"If both parents work, they can still be foster parents, but at present we have a desperate need for stay-at-home moms and foster families who are able to take preschool age children. We also need emergency, short-term and respite foster homes."

There are three designations of foster homes: regular, for a child who has no special needs; specialized, for a child who has certain challenges or disabilities; and treatment for a child whose needs are beyond what can be managed in a regular or specialized foster home.

The children whose needs are beyond what can be managed in foster care are placed in staff-operated homes or children's residential mental health settings, Elzaz says.

"People who run treatment homes usually have professional training. Especially at this level, kids often need to be placed outside of the community but we try to keep them within," says Elzas.

Foster parents receive a per diem rate to cover the expenses of caring for a child. Those caring for a child with specialized or treatment needs receive a higher per diem rate that recognizes the additional skills required in caring for these children, she says.

The agency also covers expenses such as clothing, medical and dental care, allowance, recreation and transportation.

Much thought is put into the makeup of a family before a foster child is placed, Shapiro says. "We want the child to grow in that family. It is called a foster family because siblings are there as well. We want to make sure that everyone is on board."

Many people fear becoming too attached to foster children, she says, "but I urge them to think how important they could be in a child's life. In the big picture, they could be the bridge that allows kids to go back to their own family. If that is the case, a mitzvah has been accomplished.

"We are talking about children who do not have the necessities of life. Foster parents can provide that until parents are ready to resume responsibility."

The bottom line, Friedman says, is that foster parents are regular people. "You never know what is in their hearts.

"As for foster children, every one is the same and every one is different. They are a world unto themselves, but there is a typicality."

Out of the pool and into the newsroom

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

I've never had a real job before. For me, summers have always included bathing suits, sunscreen and a whistle. Standing under the hot sun, I would watch happy kids splash around and make sure that no one was swallowing too much water – and going under – in the process.

When I realized that graduation was fast approaching and I would soon have to choose my career path, I decided that it was time for me to give up my poolside summer and move on to a job in the field I have been studying for the past three years.

But having spent most of my summers at camp, far away from office buildings and polluted cities, would I be prepared for a real-life grown-up job?

I knew there would be lots of changes and adjustments during this transition. My days of sitting under an umbrella in a chair suspended in the air were over. At a real job, I would sit only a few inches off the ground.

Getting ready for this new stage of my life included physical and mental preparation that I was not accustomed to.

Jessica Hellen

Shopping for the summer was something I had done many times before, but the items I was purchasing had changed. A bathing suit and flip flops just didn't seem like appropriate work clothes anymore.

Into my cupboard went my old worn backpack, which I used to stuff with wet towels and water bottles that dug into my back while I lugged it around.

Replacing it was a giant pale turquoise purse that could easily store my pens, notebooks and tape recorder.

I also had to set my mind to do for the summer what had essentially been my homework all year long at school.

At first, being an intern at a newspaper seemed quite different from being a lifeguard and swim instructor at a summer camp. Not only was my wardrobe different, my worries and concerns had also changed.

Instead of trying to figure out the perfect way to teach the breast stroke, I found myself trying to find the perfect words to express myself.

And instead of dreading getting into the freezing cold water, I was now dreading sitting in a freezing cold air-conditioned office.

Instead of coming home smelling like chlorine, now I come home with blackened newspaper fingers.

Once I started to think about it, I realized that my camp job actually helped me become a good reporter.

Talking to parents and politely explaining to them that their child has not yet mastered the difficult act of floating has given me the confidence to politely ask the people I interview if they mind answering a few questions.

I learned how to make explanations simple enough for young kids to understand, which has helped me write articles that are clear and easy to read.

Thinking about my past summers squatting in the shallow end teaching kids how to blow bubbles, it occurred to me that not only has my camp experience helped me as a reporter, my two jobs are actually not so different after all.

I used to stare at a swimming pool; now I stare at a computer screen.

I used to carry around a clipboard; now I carry around a notebook.

I used to write report cards; now I write newspaper articles.

Perhaps this suggests that my future jobs will all be somehow related to lifeguarding. Or maybe it shows that teaching swimming was my true calling in life until I recklessly threw it away.

Then again, it could just mean that growing up and starting a career may not be as drastic and life-altering as I once thought.

'You love them in your heart,' foster mother says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After living in four foster homes, Andrew, 17, credits his current foster family with keeping him off the streets.

"I feel lucky. If I was living with my parents, I probably would not be in school, I wouldn't play sports, I'd most likely be homeless."

Andrew moved in with foster parents Louise and John (all names in this story have been changed to ensure confidentiality) so that he could be with his sisters who lived in the home. His younger sister Rebecca, 11, has been with the family for nine years, and his oldest sister, 22, has since moved out. They do not see their birth parents.

Louise and John began fostering after their son, now 16 and an only child, told them he missed having siblings. "There had been some foster children in my extended family, so I contacted Jewish Family & Child Service and we met with an intake worker," Louise says.

"We began by taking children in for the weekend, but we wanted a commitment, so when Rebecca needed a permanent home, we took her in.

"Eventually, the other two moved in, and now we cannot remember what life was like without them. We're one big, crazy family."

When Andrew first arrived, she says, "he was a lonely guy, and he had no manners. After living in four homes, it took time for him to feel comfortable with us. Now, he's a great kid. It's wonderful to see how he has evolved."

Louise's son calls his foster siblings his brother and sister, and admits that Andrew has helped him at school when kids have picked on him. "I hope we always stay close."

Louise says there have been difficult times, and they have had to deal with many issues."Sometimes it's tempting to walk away from the whole thing, but I've made a commitment to shape them into adulthood. Besides, what parent does not feel like that at some time or other?

"The children know they are welcome to stay here as long as they want. I would like to see them go on to university or college."

She would have loved to adopt the siblings, she says, "but it was financially impossible. I can still hug and kiss and love them like my own children, though. You don't have to adopt them to love them. You love them in your heart."

Ruth and Doug, who have five children ages 16 to 41, began taking in foster children 23 years ago. Until recently they did short-term fostering, but six-year-old Amanda has been with them since last spring.

"Our own children have benefited from having foster siblings. They've grown into caring and aware adults, and four have entered a helping profession," Ruth says.

Over the years, she says, they have received calls at 3 a.m. for emergency placement – they've mostly taken in teenagers – because the youths may have gone to the police or run away from home.

"There are a number of different circumstances. Generally, JF&CS tries to resolve the situation, but if that fails, they call emergency foster care."

Ruth is active in JF&CS's foster families for families program, in which she goes into the the homes of families being served by the agency and offers practical guidance on how to run a household.

"The agency does what it can to keep families together, and sometimes I am able to help, but we also have to determine what is best for the children. Sometimes removing them from the home is best.

"The ultimate goal is to help the family change things and get the children home."

Since Amanda has arrived, she says, "we have watched her blossom. She is starting to read and she has made friends, but she still wants her mother.

"Even if you have a youngster for a short period of time, you give them a different perspective on life. They can see that there are good things out there."

Fostering is a 24-hour, seven-day-a-week commitment, she says. "We don't just house and feed the children. They're not coming here to eat. We have to be there for them 24 hours a day. We love it, though. We wouldn't change anything."

Anne, a single mother of two grown children and a foster mother of one, says fostering "just happened" to her.

"A friend of my son had been living in a group home and he spent a lot of time here. Eventually, his social worker suggested we become his foster family.

"We enjoyed having him with us so much that when he turned 18, we decided it was time to take in another foster child."

Over the years, she says, they have had other teenagers live with them, "but the aim is always for them to return home. I try to stay in contact with their family who usually want to know what is going on. Interestingly, I have stayed friends with some of the parents."

She "feels" for the teenagers. "It is traumatic for them. They've been removed from their home, they have to get used to a new environment, new family routines and new rules."

All foster parents have their own methods, she says, but she uses common sense in dealing with the teens. "If they're courteous and doing what they need to do such as school work, laundry and keeping their room tidy, why shouldn't they have some freedoms and liberties?"

She is fortunate to have these young people in her lives, she says. "They add an interesting dimension to our household, and it has made my own children aware that there is life beyond their own environment.

"Naturally, there has been some rivalry and jealousy, but even when they're yelling at each other, they are friends."

"In Grade One my child has the knowledge and ability to pray as a Jew in any Shul in the world!"

New program will help troubled Jewish youth

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

An innovative program starting up this fall aims to help troubled or homeless youth pull themselves together and become productive members of society.

Called the Jewish Identity Mentor Program, it's being organized by social worker Ed Schild as part of his Regesh Family and Child Services organization.

Schild, as well as other social service workers and agencies that deal with teenagers, has been aware of these youth for some time. There have been several efforts to help them by such agencies as Jewish Family & Child Service, JACS and Ve'ahavta – The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

"[The youth] are not necessarily homeless," Schild said. "A lot of them are on the streets, but others have drug problems, or can be seen in plazas or malls, just hanging out, so to speak, They have poor self-esteem and feel hopeless."

As well, he said, they have lost faith and trust in many of the people who try to help them. "The kids say that they don't listen to them. Well, I'm listening. And I tell them that."

Schild is proposing a six-month program. Four youths, ages 16 to 24, will come into one of what used to be the foster homes run by Regesh. Staff and house parents are still in place, Schild said, although the foster homes and group homes run by Regesh were closed down due to cuts in government funding. All the clients' needs will be provided for during the first two months, and their academic or vocational needs will be assessed.

"We will find a way to get them back to school, or to work – something so that they will be able to feel productive. They will also become more comfortable in the situation."

After two months, participants will begin a leadership training program, based on a program developed at the University of Washington called Reconnecting Youth. The program, which Schild said seems to be very effective, "aims to help disenfranchised youth develop self-esteem, and learn about helping others on drugs, their community, conflict resolution and anger management."

Naturally, the youngsters have to be ready to give up their old patterns of behaviour, Schild said.

"We tell them that they are helping us help others, because they have been there. We say that we need you to tell us how to run programs, We want to teach you to teach others."

The kids light up when they hear this, he said.

Asked why they would trust him when they have generally lost trust in the system, Schild said with a grin, "They don't trust me – they trust the people who recommend me to them."

After training, each participant will work with five other kids who used to be in the same position as they were. "We hope they can even go back to the same agency or organization that originally recommended them to us," Schild said.

When the program is complete, each youth will receive a certificate as a mentor and a $500 graduation honorarium.

During the mentorship program, Schild said, they will have to be doing something – either going to school, volunteering or working. "They can't just be sitting around."

The first group – which is expected to start in November after what Schild calls some "fine-tuning" of the program – will be made up of youth aged 18 to 22 and either exclusively male or female. Organizers want to figure out if the age range will be an issue, and if the program needs to be longer or shorter.

The main problem, Schild admitted, is money. There are no government funds available, at least at first, and the program will have to depend on fundraising.

The house where the Jewish Identity Mentor Program will be based will be known as Chezi's Corner, after social worker Chezi Goldberg, a former Torontonian who was killed in a terrorist bus bombing earlier this year in Israel. "Chezi did wonderful things with street kids in Israel, " Schild said, adding that house will be an appropriate memorial to him.

Schild has operated Regesh – a private, non-profit, charitable service specializing in working with troubled families – since 1983. Starting in 1986, it operated group homes, foster homes, and foster homes for special-needs youngsters, helping dysfunctional families and youth with behavioural and emotional problems.

From 1997 until 2003, when he was forced to close all his residential facilities, Schild also operated foster homes for Jewish children in conjunction with Jewish Family & Child Services.

After the murder of David Rosenzweig in July 2002, Schild said, he was approached by several people and organizations who were concerned about the increasing number of troubled Jewish youth, even in the Orthodox community, which, he said, "is just realizing that they have a problem too." The alleged murderer had been wandering around places where a lot of religious kids hang out, and where he knew he could get drugs, he noted.

For more information about the Jewish Identity Mentor Program, call Schild at 416-495-8832, or e-mail eschild@regesh.com.

Baycrest harnesses technology to provide better care

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

From online prescriptions to health forums via videoconference, cutting edge technology is making the rounds at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The aim is for faster, more efficient and more complete patient care, and Baycrest staff say things are off to a great start.

One such high-tech tool is the Physician Order Management (POM) system, which allows orders for tests and medication to be placed and received via computer.

"In the old days, if you wrote an order, somebody would have to look at the order and interpret it. Sometimes it was hard to interpret what was written," said Dr. Paula Rochon, senior scientist at Baycrest's Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit.

"When working with the computer... the order is totally legible... [including key details such as] the dosage, how long they should take it, etc."

Rochon said the system makes the process of prescribing medication more "streamlined," with instant feedback for physicians and, ultimately, safer prescriptions for patients.

She said the use of new technology puts Baycrest in a leadership position.

"Other people will be coming to us, looking at what we've done and seeing how they can model after that," Rochon said.

Another innovation is Baycrest's Telehealth service.

Tapping into information and technology developments, Telehealth allows medical professionals to provide care for patients and share expertise with peers through videoconferencing and Webcasts.

"Telehealth is probably having the same kind of impact as the telephone had," said Tim Patterson, Baycrest's Telehealth co-ordinator, who handles education and assesses the system's effectiveness.

"It allows [medical professionals] from around the world to interact with one another."

Patterson cited the benefits of Baycrest's Telehealth system for isolated communities in northern Ontario.

For instance, in the remote northern community of Sioux Lookout, an issue arose regarding care for agitated elderly patients.

Rather than dealing with the expense and inconvenience of travelling to Sioux Lookout – located northwest of Thunder Bay, Ont. – Baycrest medical staff took part in a series of Web-based conferences with their peers in Sioux Lookout to share knowledge on how to respond to the patients' needs.

Other sessions on everything from pain management to geriatric psychiatry have been held on a cross-continental basis using Telehealth technology.

Dr. Philip Lee, a fellow in behavioural neurology, inputs patient information on a computer-on-wheels. Baycrest is moving toward a complete electronic patient health record with two initiatives – Baycrest On-Line Documentation (BOLD) and Computerized Physician Order Entry (CPOE).

"This is a social responsibility... for us to share knowledge," Patterson said, adding that use of the system has reached about 50 hours per month.

Patterson said Baycrest aims to continue being an international centre of excellence in the areas of geriatrics and sees the Telehealth service as a way to meet that goal.

"When we lead in this initiative, knowledge is shared... professional isolation is addressed and... grants become available," he said.

Another innovation, the Baycrest On-Line Documentation (BOLD) project, has moved patient charts from paper to an electronic format.

The switch is giving staff quicker, more standardized and, if need be, simultaneous access to pertinent patient data.

"Baycrest is looking to make great strides towards complete, electronic health records," said occupational therapist Gilda Waltman, clinical co-ordinator of the BOLD project team.

Waltman said the project has been implemented in selected areas of Baycrest to iron out kinks before a full roll-out.

She said the project has the potential to make patients and physician's lives easier.

"When you have a paper chart, you're flipping through all kinds of paper, trying to decipher handwriting," she said.

"[With BOLD], you have clear, concise records that are easily read."

BOLD also makes patient records more complete and user-friendly for clinicians, Waltman said.

NCSY's Torah High planning to offer 'U' credits

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Torah High, the National Conference of Synagogue Youth's extracurricular Jewish studies program for high school students, is likely to be offering accredited "U" courses – courses geared for students wanting to attend university – as early as this fall.

The school, formerly known as Free Torah High, was approved by the Ontario Ministry of Education as a provider of high school credits two years ago, and enrolment has since risen from 60 students to more than 220 last year.

While tuition is no longer free, registration is still a modest amount at $75 for the year, including the pizza provided during each weekly two-hour class.

The school operates in 12 Toronto-area locations from Forest Hill in the south to Richmond Hill up north, and is separate from National Conference of Synagogue Youth's (NCSY) Culture Club, which runs as a weekly after-school program in about half a dozen public high schools.

Torah High, despite its midterm and final exams, is "like school but a lot more laid-back, a lot more fun," said Rabbi Glenn Black, the organization's regional director.

Up to 35 hours of the 110-hour requirement per course can be met online, on an NCSY educational trip and/or in an Ulpan Hebrew class.

The Torah High curriculum covers the spectrum of Jewish concepts from weekly parsha to Shabbat, holidays and life- cycle events. "We go through 25 concepts a year," said Rabbi Black.

"It's not just a school," he added. "It's a whole experience. It impacts a family for many generations."

The classes are "very discussion-oriented," said Rabbi Yisroel Rabinowitz, principal. "Each class has a theme, and around that theme there is a discussion."

A class about Adam and Eve, for example, is related to modern-day advertising, focusing on "what the story teaches us about how the snake tried to seduce Eve… by telling her all the wonderful things about the apple. Advertisers try to do the same thing. We try to get kids to be thoughtful about everything they see. We [also] discuss the Jewish laws for advertising."

Overall, said Rabbi Rabinowitz, the school's goal is to create a stronger Jewish identity, based on a "stronger Jewish education."

Sopman awards honour compassionate caregiving

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In 1980, when Archie Sopman's wife Belle Sopman was dying of cancer, he was grateful for the kindness she received from a student nurse at the Toronto General Hospital.

Although he had been a patient at the hospital many times and appreciated the people who gave him exceptional care, it was his gratitude to Linda Kirby that crystallized his wish to reward student doctors and nurses who performed beyond the call of duty and to honour the memory of his wife.

He believed that caregivers who go out of their way for their patients deserve recognition.

With the encouragement and inspiration of his cardiologist and friend, Dr. David Watt, he established an endowment fund at the University Health Network, the Sopman Humanitarian Award, which is given annually to student doctors and nurses who show outstanding compassion.

The University Health Network includes three hospitals: Toronto General Hospital, Toronto Western Hospital and Princess Margaret Hospital.

Archie Sopman, a partner in A. Stork & Sons, died in 1998, but made sure there was enough money to continue the awards.

Michael Sopman and his wife Judy have continued his father's legacy. This year on Belle's birthday, which coincided with the 25th anniversary of the award's establishment, nine winners were presented with cash prizes at a reception at the Sopman home in Thornhill.

Also honoured was Kirby, the first recipient of the award, and Watt, who retired from practice in 1998 and has served as director of the awards since 1980. Watt was presented with a photo of himself and his friend Archie.

At the reception, Michael Sopman told the winners that the award "seeks to encourage the characteristics of humanity, compassion and understanding, along with the ability to communicate sympathetically with patients and their families."

He praised Kirby's efforts, which, he said, "could unfortunately not prolong my mother's life, but they did make her last days more comfortable."

> 'I thought I had learned almost everything I needed to know to be a good nurse'

Kirby told of her experience as a student nurse. "I thought I had learned almost everything I needed to know to be a good nurse. I believed that modern medicine with all its extraordinary technology could, with a few exceptions, cure all.

"And then I met Belle. She taught me that the greatest gift you can give someone is to listen without judgment." She added that because of her relationship with Belle, "I became a better person. I became a better nurse."

Over the past 25 years, in excess of $150,000 has been awarded to more than 200 exceptional doctors and nurses in training who do clinical placements at the University Health Network.

The Sopman family also provides funding for University Health Network employees involved in diabetes research, care and education. The family has endowed the Archie Sopman Diabetes Clinic, which opened in 1996 at Toronto General Hospital.

Tennys Hanson, president and CEO, Toronto General and Western Hospital Foundation, told The CJN that the Sopman awards are "an example of an important idea that grew into something inspiring and significant. The Sopman Humanitarian Awards have become a part of the fabric of the culture of our hospital.

"The generosity of the Sopmans is helping to recognize the wonderful healthcare professionals who deserve our thanks and tribute. Ultimately, Michael and Judy are furthering our ability to deliver excellent patient care."

Hong Kong Jewish community rallies around one of its families

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

David Zweig, a professor of Chinese political science at the Hong Kong University of Science and Technology, recently held a dinner for more than 200 people to thank them for the extraordinary emotional, physical, financial and spiritual help they gave his family when their son, Aaron, was deathly ill.

Zweig, who grew up in Toronto, and his New Jersey-raised wife, Joy, were surprised by the amount of support they got during what was a terrible time for them. During a recent visit to Toronto, Zweig explained that they were overwhelmed – the first couple of nights Aaron was in the hospital in Hong Kong last year, 60 to 100 people came every night to sit with them; the situation touched many in the Jewish community of about 3,000; and people were unbelievably generous, he said.

Aaron, who was seven at the time, (the couple also have a daughter, Rachel, who is now 12) first appeared to have some sort of virus, one that many of his classmates also had. Just to be careful, his mother took him to the doctor. He collapsed in the office.

It turned out that a virus had attacked the muscles of his heart, a condition called acute myocarditis.

The pediatrician gave Aaron oxygen and rushed him by ambulance to Queen Mary Hospital. It was determined that his heart was functioning at only about 10 per cent of capacity.

The next morning, he was taken to Grantham Hospital, a specialized heart facility, where he was hooked up to a heart and lung machine. Unfortunately, a blood clot had formed that was blocking circulation to Aaron's right leg. After several attempts to re-establish proper blood flow, the doctors realized that they would have to amputate his leg.

David Zweig described the scene during the operation. "Members of the community gathered around us, as the operation ran through most of the evening. Dozens of them huddled in doorways and the stairway adjacent to a small sitting room where we waited for news. Some people prayed, others sat silently. All focused their energy on Aaron and on us, his family."

The next day, the community continued to support them. "They sat with us, fed us, comforted us and prayed with us. Congregants at all of the community shuls were learning of the situation, and special prayers were being said. Calls were made to friends and relatives worldwide, asking them to pray for the child in local synagogues and prayer groups."

It quickly became apparent that the heart and lung machine wasn't doing the trick. The doctors advised the Zweigs that the only hope for Aaron was an operation using an external ventricular assist pump, a machine called the Berlin Heart. There wasn't one in Hong Kong.

The machine and the pump that drives it were very expensive – more than $500,000 Cdn – and the hospital didn't have the resources to bring them from Germany.

Agency's private-home day care fosters kids' development

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

J&F Home Child Care Services is a licensed, non-profit agency that offers child care in the private homes of day-care providers.

The agency accepts children from six weeks old to 12 years old, and allows a maximum of five kids per house.

Fran Ostronoff, executive director of J&F Home Child Care Services, said there is a big difference between home child care and babysitting.

"A babysitter is a person who is 16 years of age or younger and eats my chips, drinks my pop and sits on my couch watching TV," Ostronoff said.

"Providers are working with the physical and emotional aspect of the child."

Ostronoff said small children seem to thrive in a home environment. "This is their first time being away from home, and it gives them a chance to bond with one individual rather than five or six. They're used to just dealing with mom."

Consultants visit child care providers' homes monthly to help them with programming activities and their child care concerns, as well as to talk to the children about Jewish and non-Jewish holidays.

The providers are independent contractors who work with the J&F Home Child Care Services. Before providers are allowed to work with the agency, it interviews them, contacts their references and does police-record checks, along with home safety checks.

Parents are given the names of providers to meet and interview. Ostronoff said parents should make sure their values and ideals match with the providers'. "It is very important that they're both on the same page."

While at the child care provider's house, children participate in various programs, including music, art and science.

Providers plan activities based on the agency's curriculum, which focuses on language development, socialization, emotional development and self-esteem, pre-academic learning skills, science, nature and environmental awareness, fine motor development, physical skills and cultural heritage.

If providers have their own children at home, they can participate in the programs with the rest of the kids, as long as they are around the same age.

Ostronoff said many of the providers who work with the agency are immigrants and other women who love children but also want an income.

"All of them are warm, caring human beings. These people are very dedicated. It's not a high-paying job, so they have to love children."

Ettie Barmapov said this is exactly why she decided to become a provider. "I wanted to be a stay-at-home mom to raise my own children and I also wanted the extra income."

Barmapov has been working with J&F Home Child Care Services for 14 years.

"[I like to] interact with the kids and teach them, and see the accomplishments that they have," she said.

Barmapov currently takes care of two children, one who is 3½ years old and the other who is 20 months old.

She plans her programs according to the children's levels, and includes activities around Jewish holidays and the seasons. They do crafts and make cards for father's day, mother's day, birthdays and special occasions, such as the birth of a new brother or sister.

Barmapov organizes many activities to help children learn about Jewish holidays.

On Fridays, she bakes challah with the children, for Purim they have a costume parade, on Rosh Hashanah they make cards decorated with apples and honey, for Passover they make seder plates, for Simchat Torah they make Israeli flags and on Sukkot they make sukkot out of Popsicle sticks. For Chanukah, Barmapov makes latkes, with the children helping with the mixing, and on Shavuot they create their own crowns of flowers.

Barmapov also uses cassette tapes, songs and aleph-bet blocks to help the children become familiar with Hebrew.

"I try to teach them for the outside world and to be prepared for school," she said.

Ostronoff said the agency trains providers in child care, nutrition, health care, first aid, child development, management and enrichment.

"All of our providers go through 12 weeks of training through Canadian Mothercraft Society," she said.

Herculean effort needed to acquire Berlin heart machine

Friends sprang into action, Zweig said with some awe. "The stairways became a hive of activity as the sound of cellular phones buzzed all around. The [heart machine's] company website was located on a PDA, and a German-speaking friend contacted the company by phone. The Israel consul general contacted his counterpart in Berlin. Someone laid down his credit card to cover the enormous cost to pay for the machine and the German team that would fly with it to Hong Kong."

The doctors e-mailed the hospital authority for authorization for a German doctor to operate in Hong Kong. Four hours after the financial guarantee was made, the machine was on its way to Hong Kong.

When American Express denied approval for such a large charge, a former member of the community, who now headed American Express in Singapore approved the transfer.

When the precious machine finally arrived, together with Dr. Weng Yuguo, the German heart centre's chief of surgery (originally from China), the operation could begin.

It took from late afternoon until midnight, during which time Aaron had to be switched from the heart and lung machine to the heart machine and a respirator.

"Over 100 people joined together in and around the hospital's assembly hall," Zweig said, "to pray and console each other."

In the days that followed, as Aaron coped with crisis after crisis, community members continued to rally around.

"There was never a night when no one visited," Zweig said. "We were brought lunches for the whole 50 days Aaron was in the hospital and suppers for 30 nights, until we could make our own arrangements."

Zweig had several explanations for the community's reaction. One can understand, perhaps, friends and those who knew the family from their communal activities – he has been involved as vice-president and as a member of the executive committee of the local Reform synagogue, the United Jewish Congregation; his wife is on the board of Carmel, the Hebrew day school; and both have been involved from time to time with the Chabad organization. As well, his wife is in the giftware exporting business.

But there was more. Even strangers became involved and offered support. "It touched a common thread," Zweig said. "If it could happen to him, a little boy, it could happen to anyone. They felt for us. And his survival was cathartic – if he can survive [when he is so sick], then we can too."

What impressed Zweig and his family was that it became an opportunity for the community to come together in a positive way. Rabbis and members from the Reform community, the Conservative shul, the modern Orthodox community and Chabad all joined together in prayer and concern, and to offer financial support to get the Berlin machine for Grantham Hospital, to search the Internet and connect with experts from other countries and to help pay for the expensive treatment that Aaron will need for some time.

And Aaron? Well, an alert and lively little boy came with his father for the interview, played with a dog that was there, experimented with his game boy and proudly showed off his scars. He manoeuvres his prosthetic leg with panache. Zweig says his son is 90 per cent better.

Safety, Kashruth, exercise, signs of good care, agency says.

The agency, which recently celebrated its 25th anniversary, is run by a board of directors consisting of parents, child care providers and community members.

Children are taken outside for at least two hours every day when the weather is good. They are given one meal and two nutritious snacks a day.

Ostronoff said the agency is "in desperate need of Jewish providers.

"Seventy per cent of our children are Jewish, so it's important to have Jewish providers."

Barmapov and the children she takes care of are kosher. The kids are at her house from eight in the morning until five in the afternoon, so she gives them breakfast, lunch and a snack.

"They understand that one sink is for dairy and one is for meat, even the 20-month-old."

Parents of kosher children whose provider is not kosher, supply their own food, plastic dishes and cutlery.

Ostronoff said the majority of parents who use the service are professionals and parents who have to go back to work earlier than expected after having a baby.

To ensure that all safety standards are met, the organization has an equipment, toy and book-lending library, where providers can rent portable cribs, twin strollers, triple strollers and toys.

The library is provider-run and is open once every two months on Saturday, but will open during the week for Orthodox Jews.

"It costs us about $1,500 to set up a home," Ostronoff said.

In the summertime, providers and children meet at a park to play together.

"We've had drop-ins in schools and the children do arts and crafts and music theory. We've had bowling parties and we've gone to water parks," she said.

Ostronoff said the drop-ins are important because the providers face a lot of isolation, especially during the winter.

"In wintertime, [the providers] are really by themselves. Child interaction is great, but every adult needs adult interaction."

Ostronoff said drop-ins are a good opportunity for networking, where providers can learn from each other.

"Sharing ideas is one of the best ways of learning. It's also healthy for the children to be with other children."

J&F Home Child Care Services currently has 60 providers, who take care of 150 children. It has homes in North York, North Toronto, Scarborough, Thornhill, Richmond Hill and Maple.

Centre celebrates 30 years of helping troubled youth

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Michael first came to Jewish Family & Child Service's Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre (JDD) about two years ago, he was a "boy with too much baggage."

"I didn't realize I was buckling under the weight," said Michael (client names have been changed for confidentiality), who has since graduated from the centre.

While attending JDD, Justin said, he learned more about himself than he "could ever imagine. I learned first and foremost that having a problem is OK, but doing nothing about it is not. My motto coming into JDD was more like 'I am willing to change if I do not have to do anything different.' Now, I believe I can do anything I decide to do."

JDD, now celebrating its 30th anniversary, runs out of a large, bright, mid-town house. It is dedicated to helping youth with emotional, educational and/or behavioural challenges, and offers an education program in conjunction with the Toronto District School Board for up to 34 students ages 12 to 17, as well as therapeutic group activities, cultural and recreational programs, and individual, family and group counselling.

Its staff of 12 includes social workers, child and youth workers, special education teachers and consulting psychiatrists or psychologists.

The school, then known as Centre Shelanu, opened its doors as a residential and adolescent day-care resource in November 1974, and was renamed in 1982 in honour of Jerry Diamond, who served as executive director of JF&CS for 22 years. In 1996, the residential home was closed due to budgetary constraints.

Wendy Wolfman, the centre's manager, said about 85 per cent of JDD students have some type of learning disability, and none could manage in their community school.

"Basically, they have been asked to leave or they stopped attending."

The goal, she said, is to give the students the necessary skills to take with them to their own school, or to find an appropriate school for them.

With small classes, Wolfman said, teachers are able to "see a lot, and students cannot hide from their challenges.

"Every teacher has a specialty dealing with such things as anxiety disorders, depression or learning disabilities, and the child and youth workers are skilled professionals.

"These are kids that are used to challenging adults, and our job is to figure out how to include them rather than push them away."

Staff meet with the students' families on a regular basis, she said, "because we believe that everything that goes on in a family affects the kids. We try and be as holistic as possible."

Jessica, a recent graduate, praises JDD with teaching her a lot about herself and others. "I learned that if I really want to do something and I work hard, I would get it done. I just have to put my mind to it.

"I learned that I should really get to know people before I judge them. Whoever is [attending the school] has to dedicate themselves to their work and to [dealing] with their issues. You can't get where you want without having bumps on the way."

Deborah, who spoke at a JF&CS annual general meeting, said that "when I first came to JDD, let's say I was not sweet and innocent, but over the years I have achieved many goals including changing my attitude. I could not have done that without the support of the staff and kids at JDD.

"I have been in many programs but none have benefited me as much as JDD. Every other school I have been to could not change my bad attitude, but for some crazy reason I let the JDD staff help me.

"Now I have confidence in myself and I know what I have to do for a great future. I know how to react and stand up for myself when I feel someone is putting me down."

Ron Levin, executive director of JF&CS, has been with the agency for about a year and has seen his first cycle of Jewish holiday observances at the school.

"I am touched and impressed with the way the holidays are observed. The kids are totally engaged. That is a unique part of the program," he said.

To celebrate its 30th anniversary, Wolfman said the centre is planning a fundraiser, because "despite rising costs, we have not had a budget increase in seven years."

Levin said some funds would be used to hire transition child and youth workers to help students who are returning to community schools. "They take with the tools we have taught them, but it could still be a shock to transfer to a large high school.

"The reality is that if students are able to take this program and make some changes, we would like to continue some type of support."

Referrals to JDD "come from every direction," Wolfman said.

"Parents or psychologists can call directly, or the community school can contact us. After a chat with me, we can determine if the school is right for the child."

People under 60 seeking hip and knee replacements

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The name of Toronto orthopedic surgeon Allan Gross has become synonymous with bone and cartilage transplants.

Gross, who has headed the division of orthopedic surgery at Mount Sinai Hospital since 1973, says there is a tremendous increase in the demand for hip and knee replacements for people who are under 60.

There are several theories to account for the demand, he says. "People are more athletic, they will put up with less pain, and the technology has improved, so we are willing to do this surgery on younger patients."

Gross and orthopedic surgeon Fred Langer established the bone and cartilage transplant program at Mount Sinai Hospital, which Gross says "provides a solution for patients that have had a traumatic loss of bone and cartilage in the knee and are too young for artificial replacements."

He adds that the program also plays a role in the orthopedic oncology program at Mount Sinai Hospital, providing "bone for young patients after removal of bone tumours."

The Rubinoff Bone and Tissue Bank, at Mount Sinai Hospital supplies bone and cartilage for orthopedic surgery. "Because of the availability of the banked tissue, patients are seen from all over the world for problems dealing with bone and cartilage loss," Gross says.

In Ontario, he notes, the average wait for artificial joint replacement surgery is six months.

He says that with the need for artificial joint replacement increasing, the government is providing additional resources for orthopedic surgery.

Gross was a Duncan Fellow at the Toronto General Hospital (now part of the University Health Network), where he worked under the orthopedic surgeon F. P. Dewar. There, he says, he developed his interest in bone and cartilage transplants.

In 1982, Gross became head of the combined orthopedic surgery units of the Toronto General Hospital and Mount Sinai Hospital. In 1986, he was appointed the A. J. Latner professor and chairman of the division of orthopedic surgery at the University of Toronto and a full professor of the department of surgery at U. of T. He also holds the Bernard Ghert Chair in lower extremity reconstructive surgery.

Orthopedic surgeon Allan Gross will be honoured by Mount Sinai Foundation and Canadian Technion Society at a tribute dinner at the Sheraton Centre Hotel on Oct. 17.

Gross lectures internationally and is the author of three books and numerous articles related to bone and cartilage transplantation and revision arthroplasty of the hip.

In 1973, Gross and Langer served as volunteer field surgeons in the Yom Kippur War. Since then, Gross has taught and conducted numerous surgeries in Israel, and he regularly teaches Israeli orthopedic surgeons who come to Toronto for post-graduate training. As well, surgeons from all over the world train with him at Mount Sinai.

Since 1981, Gross has been an orthopedic surgeon for the Toronto Blue Jays. He has received two World Series rings, given to players and doctors on winning World Series teams.

On Oct. 17, at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, Gross will be honoured by Mount Sinai Foundation and Canadian Technion Society at a tribute dinner.

The Technion in Haifa is Israel's oldest university, and its graduates have played a significant role in Israel's growth and development over the years. It integrates applied sciences and technology at its medical school.

Some of the funds raised at the tribute dinner will be directed to research in tissue engineering at the Dr. Allan Gross Interdisciplinary Centre for Stem Cell Research at the Technion.

As well, funds will be used for the revitalization and modernization of Mount Sinai's orthopedic unit, including enhancing the diagnostic imaging capabilities in the Schwartz-Reisman Emergency Centre.

Gross and his wife, Penny, have four children.

Unconventional learning techniques help Zareinu kids

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

During the school year, the basement hallways of the Sephardic Kehila Centre are crammed with toys and desks, and parts are curtained off into physiotherapy booths. This basement has been the home of Zareinu Educational Centre for the past six years.

The school has been caring for children with physical and developmental disabilities for 15 years. Its teaching and therapy techniques – including therapy through play, aquatherapy and an innovative physical therapy program called MEDEK – have put the centre on the educational map. Zareinu is designated as a model teaching centre by the department of physiotherapy at the University of Toronto's medical school, and student teachers also train there.

Zareinu had 110 students during the past school year, says executive director Randy Spiegel, but the number fluctuates from year to year. Sometimes students move to other schools and programs partway through an academic year.

"Over 1,000 children have been touched by Zareinu – even more when you take into consideration their families," says Spiegel, who has been at Zareinu for two years. Before moving to Zareinu, Spiegel was director of development and public relations at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Zareinu's staff includes a consulting psychologist and a variety of therapists – speech, music, occupational and physical – as well as "life skills interventionists" who teach students how to manage day-to-day activities such as going to the bank or library.

Any number of these staff members can be assigned to work with a child. Most children see several therapists. It all depends on individual needs, because each child is unique and a separate case, stresses clinical co-ordinator Carol Goldman.

"There are no fences around the way we will service a child's needs," she says.

At Zareinu, learning can be unconventional – in fact, it may not feel like learning at all, Goldman says.

"[Teachers] used magic lessons to promote skills – the manipulation of the hands over and over, sleights of hand, dexterity, taking a card and manipulating it."

Sometimes, catering to each child individually means doing intensive physiotherapy. Other times, it means building or finding new equipment, such as a specially built walker with back and leg supports for a child who has never stood up before. It might also mean doing therapy in a pool, or repetition drills to enhance verbal skills.

Sometimes it means visiting a medically fragile child at home, or it may involve organizing last-minute respite care for a child so parents can take a brief break from everyday worries.

One of the programs the school is most proud of is its MEDEK program, which was brought to Zareinu 12 years ago by Ester Fink, the school's head of physiotherapy.

MEDEK, a Spanish acronym for Dynamic Method for Kinetic Stimulation, is a South American technique that uses exercises against gravity to develop gross motor skills in children with movement disorders.

"Gravity is one of the things that makes them move," explains Fink. "You put a child in a position where they move."

What this does is train a child's muscles to balance in space, and eventually sit, stand and walk, without him realizing that he's learning.

MEDEK is ideal for infants and toddlers with cerebral palsy, Down syndrome and other developmental delays, Fink said. But even elementary-school-age kids have seen results with it.

New high school programs for Zareinu kids

"Some children make improvements right away," says Fink, who sees clients at her private physiotherapy clinic who have moved to Canada from France and Switzerland to experience her MEDEK techniques.

Zareinu is one of the few places MEDEK is offered in Toronto. Fink, who brought the technique to Zareinu after studying in Caracas, Venezuela, with its creator, Dr. Ramon Cuevas, has taught MEDEK to physiotherapists at the Hospital for Sick Children and the Bloorview MacMillan Centre.

"We're always seeking out new and innovative things," says Goldman, referring to MEDEK.

The newest Zareinu initiative is a high school program for boys at Yeshiva Darchei Torah. Starting this fall, Zareinu's teenage boys will be able to study at the yeshiva, much as its girls do in a program run out of Beth Jacob High School.

At Beth Jacob, Zareinu students are assessed based on physical and developmental needs, as well as level of Judaic knowledge. Then Beth Jacob integrates the students into its regular program, though the Zareinu kids still have access to all of Zareinu's resources – therapists can even travel to Beth Jacob to help them. The program at Yeshiva Darchei Torah is expected to work the same way.

"Both the Zareinu children and the students at Yeshiva Darchei Torah will benefit immensely from the integration possibilities," Spiegel says. "Everyone is going to benefit from this."

It would be a mistake to think that Zareinu only treats children. The family is also an important focus. The school already has an outreach program to sensitize children without disabilities to the challenges faced by some of their peers.

"It's for other students to see what it might be like to have special needs," says Spiegel. Some of the sensitization activities include putting on oven mitts and trying to eat, or communicating without speech.

"Try to put a rocket – one of those hard candies – on the tip of your tongue and talk without dropping it," says Spiegel, describing another one of the exercises.

Currently in the works is a project to build a support program for siblings of children with special needs. Zareinu received funding from the Ontario Trillium Foundation to start designing the program, but Goldman and Spiegel expect it will be several years before it's ready.

Funding is Zareinu's recurring nightmare. The school is affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education, so its parents are eligible for tuition subsidies, and it receives BJE grants, but it also fundraises on its own, through golf tournaments and moveathons, and it receives some provincial funding.

But tuition for a full-time student is still $17,500 per year. The prohibitive cost means fewer than half its students pay the full fee, but Zareinu's policy is not to turn away a child because a family can't afford tuition.

As well, when spots at Zareinu are scarce, Goldman will call around to JF&CS, the Reena Foundation or York Region Children's Services, among other agencies, to find a suitable program for a child.

"Waiting lists are impractical," Spiegel says. "These families have to find some place for their child. It's a much different waiting list than a private school."

"Anyone who comes to our door is never just turned away. We try to get them the resources they need," adds Goldman.

Based on a true story, the book is part historical thriller, part psychological study with a romantic interlude.

Arthritis clinic looks at new modes of treatment

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With its 80 original works of art, tasteful furnishings and columns painted to look like marble, the Rebecca MacDonald Centre for Arthritis and Autoimmune Disease offers an upscale, decidedly non-clinical atmosphere.

But the downtown Toronto centre, which opened last fall in Mount Sinai Hospital, is an all-in-one site for arthritis and autoimmune disease research, treatment and innovative programs, including one that allows patients to become involved in mapping the course of their symptoms on computer.

The decor does have an effect on the patients, however, according to rheumatologist Vivien Bykerk, assistant director, division of advanced therapeutics and director of the early arthritis program. "They're far more relaxed," she said in a recent interview at the centre, which serves patients from throughout Ontario.

The centre was set up with the help of a substantial donation by businesswoman Rebecca MacDonald, one of the few patients in the world to have gone into complete remission from severe rheumatoid arthritis, according to a hospital news release, which adds that she has been drug- and pain-free since 2001.

Bykerk, who did not treat MacDonald (she was a patient of the centre's director, Dr. Edward Keystone), said that the combination of treatments MacDonald used are available, although she indicated they may be expensive. She added, however, that not every medication will work for every person.

In the 17 years that Bykerk has been in practice, much progress has been made in the treatment of arthritis, a disease of the joints that causes pain and stiffness, and limits mobility.

Arthritis, which comes in 115 different forms and affects some four million Canadians, is one of the most common health problems in the world, said Bykerk. Rheumatoid arthritis alone – not a preventible condition – affects up to 300,000 patients in the country, which has only 275 rheumatologists, she noted.

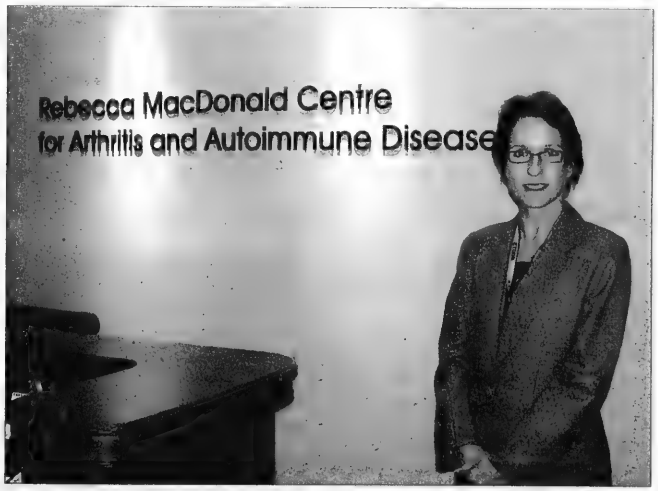
"When I started practice in 1987, it was not uncommon to have patients with very bad deformities being pushed in their wheelchairs.

"Because we're seeing them early, we aren't seeing the severe disease we used to see. It's now unusual to see someone in a wheelchair."

The early arthritis program, said Bykerk, is a way to fast-track patients with suspected early rheumatoid arthritis so they can receive optimal therapy. A referral from the patient's doctor is needed.

Current research in that program is focused on determining which patients should receive more aggressive therapy, based on genetic information that could indicate their prognoses.

"Some of our research questions have to do with what proteins are turned on by genes early in the disease. What are they doing, and should they be targeted for future drug therapy?"



Rheumatologist Vivien Bykerk said that in the 17 years she has been in practice, much progress has been made in the treatment of arthritis. [Frances Kraft photo]

Teen hopes to raise $1 million for cancer research

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

As the second of Roberta Birnbaum Cohen's three children, Phil Birnbaum, 16, considers himself "the monkey in the middle."

His sense of humour may be silly, but when it comes to making a difference in the world, Phil is very serious. Community activism and fundraising define his character, and the handful of awards he has received for his work are proof Phil is mature beyond his years.

Phil Birnbaum

At only seven years old, Phil began collecting money with his older brother for Toronto's Terry Fox Run. After raising $500 for the event, he said, he realized helping others was his calling.

When Phil's father, Perry, lost his battle to non-Hodgkin's lymphoma in 1996, Phil decided to keep his dad's memory alive. Two years later, at the age of 10, Phil launched a fundraising campaign that soon became his annual cash-for-cancer lottery.

"I was in Grade 5 and I wanted to do something productive, so I started my raffle for the Canadian Cancer Society. It just started going from there, each year getting a bit bigger," he said. "Grade 5 to 8 was very successful for me. I raised over $12,000 at Pleasantville Public School and going door to door."

Now, entering Grade 11 at Langstaff Secondary School, Phil has raised about $15,000 for the Cancer Society.

To celebrate Phil's successes, Youth in Motion, a national charitable organization that helps young Canadians "live their best life," presented the 16-year-old with its new Top 20 Under 20 award on June 22.

"I couldn't believe it at first. It was kind of a weird feeling," Phil said. "Only 20 people [out of 200 applicants] were chosen from all of Canada, and one of them was me. That's a bit overwhelming. Receiving the award really showed me that I have something."

For his involvement with the Cancer Society and his volunteer work in Richmond Hill, Phil was given a financial award to be directed toward "an educational experience" such as post-secondary studies or a summer course. He also qualified to participate in a three-day leadership summit and to be mentored by a Canadian leader for a period of eight months.

An avid supporter of Habitat for Humanity and president of his USY chapter at Beit Rayim Synagogue, Phil said he "felt honoured" that his community involvement was being recognized.

He said the fact most of the people selected for the award are older than he, entering university and "on to completely different paths" made the achievement even more special.

Aside from the Top 20 Under 20 award, Phil has received a number of other honours for his community service. In 2000, he earned the Judy Stein Junior Volunteer of the Year Award from Beit Rayim. That year, he also won the Ontario Junior Citizen of the Year award, presented to him by the Ontario Community Newspapers Association. In 2001, at 13, Phil was the youngest person ever to be named Richmond Hill's volunteer of the year.

Transmitting Jewish Culture Across Generations

For over thirty years, the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto has been engaged in teaching and scholarship on all aspects of Jewish civilization. This multidisciplinary program, which draws upon faculty from the departments of Religion, Philosophy, History, Near and Middle Eastern Studies, English, German, Sociology, Anthropology, and Political Science, is unique in Canada for the breadth and depth of its curriculum.

Over sixty courses are offered, leading to a minor, major, or specialist degree in Jewish Studies. Students can study languages (biblical and modern Hebrew, Yiddish, Aramaic, Syriac and Greek), Jewish thought and literature, Jewish history from antiquity to the present, modern Jewish society, and Israeli politics. Overseas study is encouraged, and scholarships are available for study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Phil said his work for the Cancer Society would not be possible without the support of his family, friends and generous sponsors.

Every August or September, Phil writes a letter explaining his raffle and asking for help. He then turns to local businesses and large corporations, hoping they will supply him with prizes. Ticket sales begin around March and end in April or May, he said.

"After a while, I was getting media attention. I created a binder with all of my media clippings and people started realizing that I'm not just some kid coming into their store. I had something that was worthwhile."

Sponsors quickly offered to donate their wares, and soon Phil had a list of reputable partners including the CN Tower, Famous Players and Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment. His prizes have ranged from leather jackets to snowboards to nights at hotels, but one of his favourites was a Toronto Maple Leafs jersey autographed by Tie Domi.

Phil said his mother helps him by keeping track of the prizes and doing the major paper work.

"When you see a movie, the actors are the ones that get all the credit. My mom was the one behind the scenes. She was the director," he said. "She's always been a very big support. My whole family has been great."

Phil presents the money he raises each year to the Cancer Society after the raffle closes. He said his goal is to collect $1 million for cancer research.

"My ideas change over time. First I wanted to take up golf so I could create my own charity golf tournament. But you have to get good at the sport before you can get involved in it. Dinners are also an option."

No matter what the event, Phil said he will continue fundraising for a long time."I would like to be a philanthropist once I've retired from what I choose to do. It will be a lifetime thing."

Phil said his career path is ever-changing, but at the moment he is considering corporate law in the entertainment industry. In his second semester of Grade 11 at Langstaff, Phil hopes to get a co-op placement in a law firm or government office.

So far, Phil said his non-volunteer work has offered him a chance to be a "typical teen." He has worked at Canada's Wonderland for the past two summers and was a cashier for Richmond Hill's public skating sessions during the winter.

In July, Phil spent a month in Italy taking a summer credit. "I took a modern history course and studied history, literature, art and architecture. It was a Grade 12 prep course, so everyone else was older than me. My maturity must have showed, because no one could tell I was younger."

Phil said getting a tan and learning a bit of the language were some highlights of the trip.

Back home in Richmond Hill, he's gearing up for another year of fundraising.

"This year, I want to hold marathon walks or runs. You can do it in memory of someone who you've lost to cancer. Of course, for me, that would be my dad and my bubbe. I think that would be a great way to keep in shape and help out," he said.

He also plans to further develop his raffle and said he hopes his younger sister will continue it at her elementary school.

Seniors find companionship with the L'Chaim Group

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Before Pauline Levin and her husband, Harry, emigrated from South Africa to Canada in the summer of 2000, they had active social lives.

But when they arrived in Toronto to be closer to their children, finding new friends was a challenge for the couple in their 80s.

Pauline Levin was especially in need of uplifting, so in an effort to make her transition smoother, her daughter, Brenda Faktor, and her granddaughter, Candice Faktor, founded the L'Chaim Group.

"It was born out of the desire by my mom and I to create a positive event for my grandmother to look forward to," Candice said. "The underlying purpose of the group is best illustrated in its name. It is solely for the purpose of the enjoyment of life."

Since its inception in 2001, L'Chaim Group meetings have become monthly events that bring together about 20 to 35 Jewish seniors. Like Pauline Levin, many of the participants are immigrants who are looking for a sense of community in their newly adopted home.

Whether they moved to Toronto from South Africa, Russia, Poland or Germany, these seniors have mostly found housing in three apartment buildings at Bayview and Sheppard. Candice said the location for the L'Chaim Group sessions was therefore a given – the Party Room at The Benchley, 942 Sheppard Ave. East.

Rita Witkin, who was one of the first members of the L'Chaim Group, said the cause is "something truly worthwhile.

"There were Jewish people living in our three buildings who spent a lot of time alone in their flats. They were shut-ins and it was essential to bring them out."

Witkin said she emigrated from South Africa to Canada eight years ago and has found it "a joy" to be associated with Pauline Levin and her family.

L'Chaim members enjoy arts presentations, bingo, music and lectures.

Seniors find companionship with the L'Chaim Group

Through the L'Chaim Group's programs, which feature education and entertainment, the seniors celebrate, schmooze, find companionship and enjoy themselves in a relaxed and friendly environment. Candice and her mother also serve tea at the group's meetings, throw parties and hold workshops on memories, writing and acting.

Candice said the group's favourite activities have included dramatic arts performances by the children of Tessa Desatnik's School of Speech and Drama, listening to singers Allen Smith and Denise Price, who play Yiddish and South African classics, the club's annual Chanukah potluck dinner, bingo evenings and listening to guest speakers, such as Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah.

Witkin said she loves "anything where [she] can talk, anything stimulating."

In an article for the bi-annual South African Jewish Association of Canada News, Candice wrote,"The real benefit and beauty of the L'Chaim Group is that over the years, the friendships and acquaintances made have transcended the L'Chaim Group monthly gatherings. In fact, many of the seniors, who did not know each other before we created the L'Chaim Group, have become great friends who truly care for each other."

She said her family has gotten an extremely positive response from the seniors in the group. "They like the idea, and we're always thinking of what we can do next. For me, it's been very enjoyable and rewarding."

Before her involvement with the L'Chaim Group, Candice said she had never worked with seniors. Now, she said, she has learned a lot from the members – many of whom have emigrated twice in their lives, from Europe to South Africa and from South Africa to Canada.

"These seniors are knowledgeable, wise, witty, humorous and loving," she said. "There's no better feeling than giving back to the community and doing this for them."

She said the L'Chaim Group model is easily replicable and can be duplicated in any community. All seniors are welcome to join the group, at no cost, as Candice and her mother cover the group's expenses. As well, volunteer entertainers and speakers are always in demand by the group.

While most people hear of the L'Chaim Group through word of mouth, Candice and her mother put out a monthly newsletter that includes updates, information, announcements, birthday wishes and humour.

Construction to start soon on new community cemetery

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Construction is scheduled to begin this fall on a new Jewish cemetery in York Region.

Pardes Chaim will actually be a satellite of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park – also known as Pardes Shalom – on Dufferin Street north of Major Mackenzie Drive. The new cemetery will be located one mile north of the old one, between Bathurst and Dufferin streets with an entrance off Bathurst.

William Draimin, the president of both cemeteries, said the decision to expand to a new location "was made back in the mid-1990s when it was calculated that Pardes Shalom would be fully allotted by the year 2015."

The cemetery's honorary life president Sidney Freedman said he began thinking about expanding 10 years ago.

"We were running out of major areas [in Pardes Shalom] that we could give to organizations, and we were rapidly running out of spots for the unaffiliated," he said.

The land for Pardes Chaim was purchased in 1999, and construction is almost ready to begin.

"It's taken until now to get approved," Freedman said. "You need a 10-year span to build a new cemetery. A lot of infrastructure has to go on before the first person is interred. It takes a lot of time and money."

Stephen Speisman, executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, said the new cemetery is slated to be ready for burial within four or five years.

"The purpose of the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park is to make sure there is burial land for members of the Toronto Jewish community for a reasonable price," Speisman said. "We make sure we think 75 to 100 years in advance so we don't run out of burial plots."

Pardes Shalom, which is on 89 acres of land, has approximately 35,000 burial plots.

Pardes Chaim, which is on 200 acres of land, will have between 70,000 and 90,000 burial plots.

Speisman said he hopes the cemetery will last at least 50 years, a projection that he said is more conservative than others, who think it could last last longer.

"I expect that some 10 years after the cemetery opens we'll be looking for new land, and it probably won't be very close to Toronto," Speisman said.

"It's hard to find land appropriate for a cemetery and land that would get zoning approval."

The new cemetery will use 120 acres of its 200 acres for burial, with the rest being green-belt land.

Freedman said his plan is to make the cemetery "exceedingly beautiful."

The name Pardes Chaim was chosen, because "we wanted to retain the name Pardes as a sort of signature name," Speisman said.

Construction to start soon on new community cemetery

"We wanted a name that people could remember very easily, even if they are not fluent in Hebrew. A traditional Hebrew name for a cemetery is beis chaim, which means house of life or eternal life."

Speisman said Pardes Chaim was an "appropriate name" that "seemed to the fit the bill and would be easily recognizable."

Freedman said the new cemetery will have a lunchroom for staff, a utility building to store equipment such as cranes and trucks, a meeting room and offices. Long-term plans include facilities for taharah (ritual cleansing of a body) and possibly a chapel.

"The expenditure will be considerably more than Pardes Shalom," Freedman said.

The cemetery will be developed in phases and construction will probably start on an initial 80 acres, Speisman said.

"It seems to be more economical to develop the first 80 acres to make sure the community is looked after for the foreseeable future.

"The land itself costs $4 million. We expect to spend in the next several months about another quarter million dollars. We estimate that the cost of development of this 80 acres will be $4.3 million," Speisman said.

Before construction begins, Freedman said the cemetery will have a dedication service.

"It has to be consecrated to make it a holy ground. The rabbinate and community will be invited."

CHALLAH BAKING COMES TO MISSISSAUGA:

Rebbetzin Sara Slavin of the fledgling Chabad of Mississauga held a challah baking night for women from the local community. Participants picked up new braiding and baking tips and learned how to separate challah, one of the mitzvot that are the particular obligation of women. Rabbi Yitzchok Slavin, who recently moved to Mississauga with Sara and their son Yehoshua, has been working at the Chabad central tenet of outreach: he declared a Mezuzah Month during which he checked local mezuzot and replaced those deemed necessary, had a tfillin campaign, built a sukkah in the family's front yard, held a Purim party and later a model seder, distributed Pesach boxes for the needy and had a cheesecake party at Shavuot. He also taught a number of classes. Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services will be held at the South Common Community Centre.

Israeli experimental school fosters creativity

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Maale Tzvia, a small Israeli village in the Galilee, has made its mark in international education circles.

A school founded there, the Golden Education Template (GET), spawned an experimental education system and branches in the United States, England, the Netherlands and Canada.

The Balanced Education Network, a non-profit organization associated with the Toronto GET school, invited the principal of the Israeli school and one of its founders, Edith Kimchi, to speak at a seminar at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre last month.

GET had been operating as a kindergarten for seven years, when parents approached the teachers about expanding the program into a full-fledged multi-grade school, Kimchi recalled. "A group of 10 teachers and parents formed a school. We learned through trial and error."

This year, 260 students attended the school, which now goes to Grade 10.

The GET program emphasizes growth apart from academic learning, a core element that distinguishes it from other schools, said Kimchi. She added that academic and "internal learning" are of equal value. The latter nurtures "a preparedness for a moral life," as well as "internal development to overcome fears."

Children are encouraged to be assertive and to differentiate between fact and opinion, she said. "They can speak up and argue when they don't agree with the facts."

Teaching students to find creative solutions to their problems is another important aspect of their development, she said, as is taking on responsibility. "The teachers and the students clean everything at the school."

Respect for Arab neighbours is also encouraged by the school. The high school students are involved in a theatre program with their Arab counterparts in a neighbouring village, Kimchi said. "It's one of the few programs of coexistence that actually exists."

Unlike traditional schools, GET discourages competition between students. Kimchi said, "We understand that competition is anti-social, because it represents pressure to be better than another person."

The GET system motivates students "with the values of co-operation and cohesion, which are antithetical to the more egocentric values of money and power," she continued.

"It is much more pleasant and advanced to work with people who are respected for what they are – natural geniuses."

Encouraging the "natural genius of the child" is an important focus of the program, said Kimchi. "By the age of puberty, we experience a lot of brightness from the students."

The GET system recognizes the importance of making the lessons interesting and engaging. "When children want to learn and love to learn, they learn much faster," she said.

Leo Baeck welcomes new director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The new director of Leo Baeck Day School says he didn't actually decide to pursue a career in education.

"It just fell on me, and I realized that was what I was meant to do," said David Prashker, who is succeeding Zita Gardner on her retirement.

A native of London, England, who moved here July 23, Prashker, acquired a taste for teaching in France, where he taught for a year to fund his studies as a university student in the 1970s, and in Israel, where he taught high school students on a kibbutz and worked with a local youth movement during the 5½ years he lived there.

"I love working with kids," he said last week in his office at Leo Baeck's Thornhill campus. "I also love studying, and you can be a student all your life when you're a teacher."

It wasn't until 1988 that he completed his post-graduate teaching certificate in London, having already earned a BA in humanities and a master's degree in drama and theatre studies.

"I like adventures," said Prashker of his decision to leave England for the new position in Toronto. "I've always liked the idea of coming to this side of the Atlantic."

He'd thought about making the move to school administration for several years, and his 50th birthday approaching in 2005 provided further impetus.

For the past 14 years, following a one-year stint at an Orthodox Jewish school in London, Prashker taught at Clifton College, a co-educational boarding school in Bristol, which has had a Jewish component since 1878. Most recently, he was the school's head of Jewish studies and director of Polack's House, its Jewish boarding facility.

Although he was raised in the Orthodox tradition, Prashker has been "very much a Reform Jew" for many years.

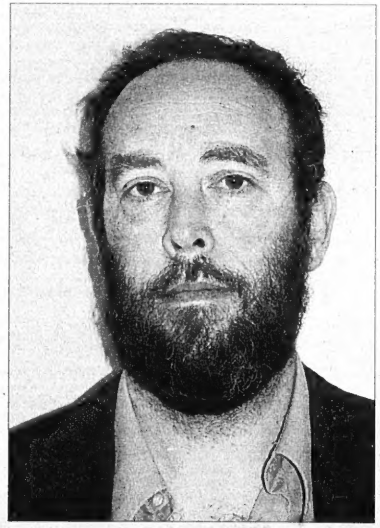
He believes Jewish schools should provide "both a theoretical and a practical knowledge of every aspect of what it means to be Jewish so [students] are in a position to choose their own Jewish identity when they become adults."

In today's post-Holocaust world, and following the creation of the State of Israel, being Jewish is more complicated than ever, Prashker said. For shtetl Jews in eastern Europe – or Jews in North Africa – life was difficult, but being Jewish was simple, he said.

At Leo Baeck – the only Reform Jewish day school in Canada – Prashker's immediate goals are to "solidify the strengths" of what he said is already a very strong school. It has two campuses and more than 775 children from junior kindergarten to Grade 8.

At least for his first year, Prashker will not be working in the classroom, but he is looking forward to creating opportunities to interact with the students. "I would very much like to not be stuck behind my desk. I don't think you get to know the children properly."

As director, he believes in consultation and discussion, and sees his role as that of facilitator – being "at the centre of the circle, with lots of strings around the edges. You've got to make sure you're holding the strings… but not too tightly… so that teachers can teach to the best of their ability, and students are learning to their best potential."



David Prashker

Golden Education Template [GET] emphasizes more than academic growth

The school has a two-way pact between the teachers and students. "The students make a commitment to behave well so that learning can be fun," she said, "while the teachers make a commitment to make learning fun and interesting."

Children are encouraged to give the teachers immediate feedback by holding up colour-coded cards indicating the level of interest and enjoyment of a particular lesson.

Kimchi pointed out that one of the ways the school maintains a high level of interest is to make academia a multi-sensory experience that addresses multiple intelligences. Unlike traditional schools, GET does not divide the day into periods in which different subjects are taught. Students concentrate on one subject for about a month at a time and study it intensively through drama, music or arts and crafts.

An important component of the GET community is the "fraternity of volunteers" who are integral to the life of the school, Kimchi said. "Parents are invited to volunteer – to give and be generous. The parents come to clean, renovate and contribute their skills and talent... We encourage the natural genius of parents."

The school regards parents as key educators of their children. When it comes to behaviour, Kimchi said, parents must take on a leadership role. "Sometimes we don't consider what children don't know. Parents need to take the time to teach their children how to behave."
